The United States possess an advantage over all the nations of the earth in two things highly conducive to human happiness—oysters and peaches. Men may disagree about forms of government, or the fine arts, or the relative merits of poets, painters, and actors; and whether they are right or wrong, may be perfectly sincere and well-meaning in their opinions; but whoever denies the complete supremacy of the oysters and peaches of this part of the world, must be given over as incurably infected with prejudice and perverseness. The peaches of England are nothing, and the oysters, generally speaking, no more to be compared to these, than a crab-apple to a pippin; though there ought to be an especial reservation made in favour of what is called the "Colchester native," the flavour of which must dwell in the grateful remembrance of all who have had the good fortune to taste them; they are uncommonly sweet, but small—a very choice oyster for ladies; but when taken into a tolerably capacious mouth, do not touch the palate at every point—there is still something wanting, and you do not experience that unalloyed gratification, that fulness of delight which is the necessary consequence of swallowing a large, fresh, fat, York-bay oyster. So extremely grateful are the latter to all who truly appreciate their estimable qualities, that every additional one only creates a keener desire for its successor,

"As if increase of appetite had grown
By what it fed on."

until the stomach signifies its incapacity to receive a farther supply of the luscious and delectable food.

Man is naturally a self-opinated contrary animal, and feels a natural inclination to disagree with his species on all earthly questions; but still he divides into parties and subdivides into factions, and it is possible to find half a dozen people who have the same views in politics, religion, and literature; but perhaps no two were ever created since the creation who held exactly the same tenets respecting the stomach. They may hold on together for some time, and confess they both like boiled salmon or roast ducks; but let them speak upon the subject of eating for a quarter of an hour, and a hundred minute but important differences of taste discover themselves. Indeed, two men alike in this respect would be a much greater rarity than the two Dromios. There are few points on which there is a more unanimous opinion entertained than oysters. All agree as to their virtues in the first instance; but whether they are best raw, or stewed, or fried, or broiled, or pickled, is the subject of endless cavillings and interminable harangues. The longest dispute I ever listened to was whether it was best to devour these creatures with black pepper or red; and such was the earnestness of the disputants that the man employed in opening them, making a mistake, kept helping the red-pepper advocate with black and the black-pepper zealot with red; and to the infinite amusement of the lookers on, neither found out the difference until they were told, when both instantly declared they thought the oysters had a very peculiar taste! just as newspapers or politicians will now-a-days commence a fiery dispute concerning democrat and federal parties, or the powers of the general and state governments, until they unconsciously change sides in the course of the argument, without being anything the wiser; and just so trivial and undistinguishable are half the disputes into which we poor brainless bipeds plunge with such uncontrollable fury, to the infinite amusement of all calm and dispassionate spectators. But it will not do to go on grounding general reflections on an oyster. It was made for better things than from which to extract a questionable moral. I would if I could be eloquent in thy praise, thou best and gravest* of fish—thou most nutritious and digestible of molluscous substances—thou staunchest friend and steadiest supporter of Africa's trampled sons, for whom thou daily effectest more than Wilberforce can ever hope to compass—much do I regret that the insatiable appetites of the citizens are robbing their bay of its greatest beauty; like the boy who killed the goose for the golden eggs, they are not content with the yearly produce of thy fruitful beds, but they leave them oysterless, seize on both interest and principal, and expect a miracle to provide for the future. It is easy to foresee the ruinous consequences of such atrocious conduct—but it is not in common prose that thy merits and sufferings should be commemorated, I will take my harp and sweep its softest strings.

LINES ON A NEWLY-OPENED YORK-BANKER.

With feelings strange and undefined I gaze upon thy face,
Thou choice and juicy specimen of an ill-fated race;
How calmly, yea, how meekly thou recliest in thy shell,
Yet what thy woes and sufferings are man may conjecture well!

For thou hast life as well as he who recklessly seeks thine,
And couldst thou speak, mightst draw forth tears as briny as thy brine;
For thou wert torn from friends and home and all thy heart could wish,
Thou hapless, helpless, innocent, mute, persecuted fish.

Perhaps thou wert but newly joined to some soft plump young bride,
Who op'd her mouth for food with thee when flow'd the flowing tide;
Perhaps thou hast a family, from whom thou hast been torn,
Who sadly wail for him, alas, who never will return!

Thou wert happy on thy native bed, where blithesome billows play,
Till the cruel fisher wench'd thee from thy home, sweet home, away;
He stow'd thee in his coble and he rowed thee to the strand—
Thou wert bought and sold and open'd, and placed in this right hand!

I know that while I moralize thy flavour fades away,
I know thou shouldst be ate alive, before thy sweets decay!
I know that it is foolishness this weak delay of mine,
And epicures may laugh at it as sentimental whine.

Well, let them laugh, I still will drop a tear o'er thy sad fate,
Thou wretched and ill-fated one! thou sad and desolate!
O'er thee and o'er thy kindred hangs one all-consuming doom,
To die a slow and lingering death, or living find a tomb!

* Wherein consists the superior gravity of an oyster is not very apparent; yet it has long had that reputation as is evident from the ancient and well-known couplet:

The gravest beast is an ass, the gravest bird an owl,
The gravest fish an oyster, the gravest man a fool.

† Oysters taken from the river and kept in fresh water, open their mouths at the time of the flowing in of the tide, in expectation of their accustomed food.—Kitchiner.

‡ Those who wish to enjoy this delicious restorative in the utmost perfection must eat it the moment it is opened, with its own gravy in the under shell; if not eaten while absolutely alive, its flavour and spirit are lost.—Ibid.

Like the Indian from the forest—like the roebuck from the glen,
Thy race is dwindling silently before the arts of men;
Ye are passing from the river, from the sea-bank, and the shore,
And the haunts that long have known ye shall know ye soon no more!

The Blue-point and the Shrewsbury* are vanishing away,
And clamless soon will be our streams, and oysterless our bay;
Rapacious man, before your prime, ordains that ye shall die,
And drags ye from your cool retreats to broil and stew and fry!

Why were ye made so racy, rich, and luscious to the taste?
'Tis that has stripped your thickest banks and made your beds a waste;
"Your virtues have proved sanctified and holy traitors to ye,"
And that which was your proudest boast has served but to undo ye!

Even I, the friend of all your kind, when I think of what thou art,
When I ponder o'er the melting joys thy swallowing will impart,
Can delay thy fate no longer; one look, it is my last!
A gulp—one more—a silent pause—a sigh—and all is past!

C.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

PORTRAITS OF CELEBRATED CHARACTERS.

MRS. SIDDONS.

IN the extended range of dramatic biography it will be impossible to find united in one family such a perfect concentration of talent and genius as was, and still continues, combined in the celebrated family of which the subject of our present sketch forms so distinguished an ornament.

This family has for the last fifty years been the boast and pride of the British stage. The classic learning and refined taste of John Kemble, aided by his accurate knowledge and perfect delineations in the histrionic art, gave to the stage a degree of splendour and prosperity it had never before attained. To his efforts the British drama is principally indebted for its present perfection in the correctness of its costume, and the splendour of its scenic and other embellishments. Garrick had, indeed, commenced the work of reformation, but it was reserved for his distinguished successor to the managerial throne to perfect and complete that entire change, which has given to dramatic performances in our day the splendour and identity of the times they are intended to represent. Charles Kemble has succeeded to the vacant authority created by the secession of his talented brother, and, not deterred by the declining patronage now afforded to theatres, continues to improve and enlarge upon the plans of his predecessor, which it was supposed were scarcely capable of attaining to a higher degree of excellence; and also in his professional capacity as an actor, he stands unrivalled in a certain range of characters. Even the main branches of this remarkable family are celebrated for their talent and genius, which perhaps would have been more duly appreciated had not the overwhelming superiority of John Kemble and Mrs. Siddons absorbed the almost undivided attention of the public during their long and brilliant career. A "young scion of the house" has lately appeared, however, who promises to attain an elevation equal to any of her celebrated relatives. Miss Fanny Kemble, daughter of the present manager of Covent-Garden theatre, is represented as possessing most of those peculiar excellences which were the distinguishing attributes of the incomparable actresses who heads our present article. To youth, beauty, and the true "Siddonian" face, is united the highest powers of intellect, and a force of conception and execution, which is considered astonishing for her age. She has already by her popularity raised the "drooping fortunes" of that house, to which her talented family have been so long closely united; and if the accounts in the public prints are to be depended on, she promises at no very distant period to fill the vacant throne of Melpomene, which, since the days of Miss O'Neill, has never been held by an adequate representative.

But foremost and most exalted in the family group stands "THE SIDDONS." Her fame has been more widely extended, her talents more universally acknowledged, and her astonishing powers have been more generally felt and appreciated than any of her celebrated relatives. Criticism has been disarmed in witnessing the displays of her excellence, and the most fastidious dramatic amateur has awarded to her the palm of undisputed perfection in the scenic art. Among the many testimonials on record of the high estimation this gifted woman has been held in by the talented writers of her age, none perhaps are more forcible than those left by Dr. Johnson and Lord Byron. The one, valuable as establishing her early claims to the perfection of dramatic excellence, the other as showing that the lapse of nearly forty years had not diminished the powerful impression made by her unrivalled talents. Dr. Johnson, in a conversation with Glover, the author of Leonidas, shortly after Mrs. Siddons made her second appearance in London, said of her, "On the stage art does not adorn her; nature adorns her there, and art glorifies her." Lord Byron, after her secession from the stage, thus eloquently describes her professional character, and testifies to the impression left behind of her splendid exhibitions of dramatic excellence. In a note to the preface of one of his tragedies, his lordship says, "I have made and kept a resolution to see nothing which should divide or disturb my recollections of Siddons. Siddons and Kemble were the ideal of tragic action. I never saw any thing at all resembling them, even in person." His lordship's opinion will be readily echoed by every lover of the drama who may have witnessed her performances—she was indeed unique!

* Two famous species, now nearly extinct.

The biography of Mrs. Siddons would necessarily comprise a history of the British stage during the long period in which she was its chiefest ornament. The elaborate memoirs of Boaden are before the public, and will be found to comprise all the incidents connected with her public life. Our object is to condense a few personal recollections of this highly-gifted actress; to which, however, a very brief notice of her early career may not be an inappropriate introduction.

Mrs. Siddons was born and educated to the profession of an actress; her father, Mr. Roger Kemble, being the manager of a company of comedians. She was born at Brecknock in 1775, and gave early indication of those talents which even at the premature age of seventeen, induced her to apply to Garrick for an engagement at Drury-lane theatre, then under his sole management. The great actor consented to hear her recite some speeches from Jane Shore, praised her voice, wondered how she had contrived to get rid of the provincial monotony, then the sure mark of country actors, and politely dismissed her by stating the engagements he was under with the leading actresses of his theatre, which entirely precluded him from affording her the public trial she requested.

Before she had attained the age of eighteen she became united to Mr. Siddons. Young and inexperienced, with the cares of an establishment to provide for their future support, the stage presented the only means of attaining these necessary accompaniments to the marriage state. Mr. Siddons is represented as an actor of but mediocre talents; but the growing popularity of his youthful wife made them both speedily emerge from the obscurity which had hitherto surrounded them, and placed them in a situation more genial for the display of Mrs. Siddons's powers, which were soon to excite universal homage and admiration.

Shortly after their marriage we find Mrs. Siddons the great source of attraction at Cheltenham, a fashionable watering-place in England, similar to our Saratoga Springs. Here, surrounded by the great and powerful, the talented and the gay, the young actress became a magnet of universal attraction in her professional character, and the object of respectful attention in private life. Fame, with her thousand tongues, wafted her growing popularity to the ears of the great Roccus, and in compliance with the wish of her titled patrons, Garrick engaged her for Drury-lane theatre. Her success at first was not decisive enough to warrant an extension of that engagement; and we find her shortly afterwards returning to the provincial theatres, where she had before acquired such undisputed celebrity. Six years from the period of her first appearance in London, she returned to the boards of a metropolitan theatre, and fully sustained that high reputation her warm admirers had so strenuously insisted upon her possessing. From that period until her formal departure from the stage in 1812, this celebrated woman was held to be the undisputed queen of tragedy.

Of the combined excellences which contributed to place Mrs. Siddons first among her famous cotemporaries, it is perhaps impossible to convey an adequate impression. She is represented in early life to have been eminently beautiful. The splendid portrait of her by Sir Joshua Reynolds, as the tragic muse, fully justifies her claims to beauty of the highest order; but beauty, as an abstract, was her least attraction. It was the "intelligence within," the mighty genius which, shining through the countenance and illumining every feature, produced that universal homage paid to this gifted actress. Her figure also was the subject of repeated eulogium. It was of that description which admirably fitted her for the representative of the favourite heroine of the drama. Tall and majestic, she moved the very queen of sorrows, and gave an identity to the scene by the perfect representation of the characters she assumed. The grace and propriety of her action were also able accessories in the establishing of her reputation, and which never failed her during the long and splendid career she enjoyed; nor must we omit that voice,

"So tuned to harmony," that, whether in the deep whispering of womanly or filial affection, or at the full height of offended dignity and fiercest rage, or stretched to its utmost tension of frantic grief, retained a tone so skilfully modulated, that the severest critic could not detect any violation of the rules of harmony.

Much of the excellence of Mrs. Siddons may be traced to other sources besides those of mere personal advantages. She, like her brother, the late John Kemble, devoted herself to the study of the principles of the art, of which she became so inimitable a professor. Acting was studied as a science; nature was not sacrificed for mere effect in her performances, nor the trick of acting substituted for the genuine and legitimate production of real histrionic talent. How frequently have we seen, in the representation of those characters in which she was pre-eminent, effect the only merit of the performance; the genius, the soul, which should have embodied the whole was absent; the actress, acquainted with the business of the stage was visible, not the mighty creation of the poet's brain, endowed with a brief but vital existence.

To enumerate the various characters in which Mrs. Siddons shone with undivided excellence, would be merely to recapitulate nearly the whole of the acting tragedies, assigning her the heroine; still there are distinctions of perfection to be named in this list, and which also mark the different characteristics of her acting. Her Katherine of Arragon displayed the very acmé of regal dignity and sublimity of sorrow to the last; this character was one of her chiefest favourites; and so late as the year 1812, we remember seeing her represent this injured queen, with apparently undiminished powers. The Lady Constance, in King John, was another of this class of acting, which apparently has been lost to the stage since her secession. Nothing could convey a more perfect picture of dignified sorrow and deep maternal grief than was given by Mrs. Siddons in this character. Hermione, in the Winter's Tale, is also a part which she appropriated exclusively to herself. The statue scene in this play was the perfection of the mimic art, as represented by her. Marble could not be more inanimate than she appeared, until the "cunning of the scene" required her reanimation, when the audience expressed, by their admiration and surprise, the feelings of Leontes, and were ready to exclaim, in equal wonder,

"She moves, she breathes, she lives!"

In characters requiring the sublime and terrific, Mrs. Siddons had no competitor. Lady Macbeth became exclusively a personification of her own: no actress since her day has given even the outline of the character, when compared with her stupendous delineation of this master-piece of Shakespeare. From her first entrance with the letter to the closing scene, where the guilty slave of foul ambition is discovered walking in her sleep, it was one unvaried display of unequalled art, yet so true to nature, that the spectator forgot the illusion of the scene and the actress, and only saw the blood-stained woman of the poet's creation.

In the chaste and more subdued characters of domestic life, Mrs. Siddons also displayed unrivalled excellence. Her Isabella, in Southern's tragedy of that name, first established her reputation with a London audience, and continued to be one of her most admired representations. Mrs. Beverley in the Gamester, and Mrs. Haller in the Stranger, were in her hands the very perfection of that class of composition.

We will not extend the catalogue of characters which this extraordinary actress, by her exquisite personification, appropriated to herself, and which, as far as to mere representation, must live in the remembrance of her admirers, as perfect models of the scenic art. No actress in our day has left so powerful and lasting impression on the public mind; and few of her distinguished predecessors excited the enthusiasm, or obtained that admiration nearly amounting to idolatry, which attended Mrs. Siddons during her long theatrical existence. She has been compared to "a being of a superior order, who had dropped from another sphere to awe the world with the majesty of her appearance." Hyperbolic as the comparison may be, it conveys a very forcible picture of the impression produced by her acting. She did, indeed, embody to the imagination the fables of mythology, of the heroic and deified mortals of other times.

Of the private character of this lady we shall, from inclination and necessity, be very brief in our notice. That Mrs. Siddons was no less the ornament of her profession in private life than she was its distinguished idol in her public capacity, is a fact well known in the circles in which she moved. An unblemished purity of character, and an unspotted reputation, are the proud testimonials which have been universally awarded to her. Malevolence has somewhat tarnished this "fair fame," by attributing to her an anxious desire for the emoluments arising from her talents, sometimes evinced to the exclusion of more generous feelings. In our admiration of Mrs.

Siddons we scarcely can allow her the possession of this natural foible; many of her disinterested acts of kindness are on record; and it may be further added, that the prudence and general propriety of her conduct may have been extended to a proper regard of her fortune, without exciting any strong grounds for reprehension.

In her family connexions Mrs. Siddons was, and continues to be, an object of peculiar esteem and admiration. Her services have ever been at their disposal, and her unrivalled powers have at all times been the themes of their warmest eulogies. The late John Kemble was particularly attached to her, and on all occasions acknowledged her eminent superiority over the rest of his family. One anecdote that we heard a few years since, from a relative of Mrs. Siddons, may serve to illustrate this fact:

On the evening of the first representation of Sheridan's Pizarro, a nobleman, well known in the dramatic world, went into the green-room at the close of the performance, and after congratulating Sheridan on the success of his piece, he turned to John Kemble, and paid him a well-merited compliment on his personification of the Peruvian hero. "Yes," my lord, returned Kemble, "Rolla is a fine noble fellow, and will doubtless be a great favourite; but it is to Sarah (the familiar appellation he used when speaking of Mrs. Siddons) that the greatest praise is due; she has converted a soldier's trull into a tragic heroine."

Mrs. Siddons is still living in elegant retirement, upon the ample fortune she acquired by her professional exertions. We saw her a short time since at Covent-Garden theatre, at a representation of the Inconstant, which by the excellent performance of Charles Kemble as Mirabel, was then enjoying the full career of public favour. She appeared to enter into the spirit of the play with great zeal, and showed, even at her advanced age, many traces of that grace and dignity which constituted in early life her distinguished ornaments. H^c.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

COMMON SENSE.

COMMON SENSE is a rare and enviable quality. It may be truly said that "its price is above rubies." How many learned men, how many geniuses, how many dull and ignorant people, how many cunning knaves, how many well-meaning fools are without it! How few have it, and how little do they or others know it, except from the infallible results—for one of its first requisites is the utter absence of all pretension. The vulgar laugh at the pedant and enthusiast for the want of it, while they themselves mistake bigotry and narrow-minded notions for it. It is not one of the sciences, but has been well pronounced to be "fairly worth the seven." It is a kind of mental instinct, that feels the air of truth and propriety as the fingers feel objects of touch. It does not consist with ignorance, for we cannot pronounce on what we do not know; and on the other hand, the laying in a stock of knowledge, or mastering any art or science, seems to destroy the native simplicity, and to warp and trammel the unbiassed freedom of mind which is necessary to its receiving and giving their due weight to ordinary and casual impressions. Common sense is neither a peculiar talent nor a laborious acquirement, but may be regarded as a sound and impartial judgment operating on the daily practice of life, or on what "comes home to the business or bosoms of men;" combined with great attainments and speculative inquiries, it would justly earn the title of wisdom; but of the latter we have never known a single instance, though we have met with a few of the former; that is, we have known a number of persons who were wise in the affairs of the world, and in what concerned their own interest, but none who, beyond this, and in judging of general questions, were not the dupes of some flaw of temper, of some weakness or vanity, or even striking advantage of their own. To give an example or two in illustration:—A person may be an excellent scholar, a good mathematician, well versed in law and history, a first-rate chess-player, a dazzling fencer; in a word, a sort of admirable Crichton—you are disposed to admire or envy so many talents united—you smile to see him wanting in common sense, and getting into a dispute about a douceur to a paltry police officer, and thinking to interest all Europe and both houses of parliament in his success. No one can have arrived at years of discretion without knowing or feeling that he cannot take a single step without some compromise with existing circumstances; that the path of life is intercepted with innumerable turnpike gates, at which he must pay down the toil of his own convictions and of strict justice; that he cannot walk the streets but by tacit allowance; and that to disregard all impediments in the right line of reason and written forms, is to imitate the conduct of Commodore Truncheon, who mistook the land for the sea, and went to be married by the wind and compass. All affectation is the death of common sense, which requires the utmost simplicity and sincerity. Liars must be without common sense, for, instead of considering what things really are, their whole time and attention are taken up in imposing false appearances on themselves and their neighbours. No conceited person can have the faculty we have been speaking of, since all objects are tinged and changed from their proper hue by the idle reflection of their fancied excellence and superiority. Great talkers are in the same predicament, for they sacrifice truth to a fine speech or sentiment, and conceal the real consequences of things from their view by a cloud of words or empty breath. They look at nature not to study what it is, but to discover what they can say about it. Passionate people are generally thought to be devoid of judgment. They may be so, when their passions are touched to the quick; but without a certain degree of natural irritability, we do not conceive truth leaves sufficient stings in the mind, and we judge correctly of things according to the interest we take in them. No one can be a physiognomist, for example, or have an insight into character and expression, without the correspondent germs of these in his own breast.

London Atlas.

ENGLISH FEMALE EQUESTRIANS OF THE PRESENT YEAR.

We asked in what degree the art of riding on horseback may be considered as a female accomplishment, and in how far it conduces to the ornament and attraction of a modern elegant? We will answer in brief, that we know of no other art which demands so many natural qualifications to render it graceful and suitable in a female practitioner; but that fashion, that deity of despotic sway, having issued forth her decree in its favour, there is an end of all cavilling as to whether it ought or ought not to be; for we hold that, in the realm of fashion at least, if no where else, "whatever is, is right." It follows, that every young lady, whatever be her turn of mind or style of figure, slight or clumsy, daring or timid, makes it her first care to procure a steed, which will enable her to take her place among her compeers in Rotten-row; this end achieved, all minor considerations are thrown aside, and many a lovely creature, who, in her own sphere of action would be charming to all beholders, is here exposing herself to the sneering remarks of the looker-on, or at least to their compression. To avoid a conclusion so unpleasant, it may not be amiss to lay down a few rules for the guidance of those of our fair readers who may wish to become candidates for equestrian honours.

We shall, however, proceed with considerable caution in so delicate a matter, and profess not to venture upon a single remark that cannot fail to be supported by the highest authorities.

In the first place, then, let no one entertain the idea of controlling the motions of a horse, till she is satisfied she can control her own; in other words, the female equestrian should be "cast in nature's fairest mould," and possessed of such unacquired ease, and instinctive agility, as will enable her to lend a grace to every movement, whether it be to mount with facility, to check her horse without an effort, or to dismount again without endangering the lives of the by-standers; she must also have attained a certain proficiency under Fozard or Davies, that she may feel a confidence in her own powers, and be able to act with decision in any case of emergency.

To enforce this part of our theory, we cannot do better than recommend to our fair pupils' observation, as its happiest illustrations, in the symmetrical elegance and lightness of their figures, and the ease and confidence they display in the management of their palfreys, Lady Frances Gower, the Ladies Grey, Lady Charlotte Gordon, Miss Freemantle, the Ladies Paget, Lady Augusta Paulet, and the Miss Johnsons; we must even add to our list the dowager Lady Salisbury, who may be taken as a model for the uprightness and pliancy of her carriage, the ease with which she adjusts her seat, and the command she possesses over her pretty flea-bitten grey.

We now come to another important feature in the design of our essay—the style and character of the horse to be selected. Between fourteen hands and a half and fifteen hands in height, he must possess the most beautiful shape and figure, the highest breeding, the very best condition, a good mouth, be perfectly well broke, of high courage, (for what so unseemly as the application of the whip?) and a good temper. As to the prominent points of his figure, he should, above all, rise well in the withers; he must have the smallest head, with a rainbow neck, be short in the back, well rounded in the quarters, with a full-sized square, or flowing tail, (by no means the least important accessory to the "tout ensemble") finely traced limbs, of sufficient substance in the body, and a coat like silk. He may be allowed a double rein, with a coloured front to his bridle, and a highly worked saddle, with a plain white saddle-cloth beneath. We cannot point out more perfect specimens of that desideratum, so rarely to be met with, and so much to be cherished when possessed, a real lady's horse, than by directing attention to those ridden by Lady Sefton and the Ladies Molyneux, Lady Cowper's blood bay, Lady Sarah Ingestrie's chesnut, Lady Tankerville's jet black, and Lady Laura Fitzroy's milk-white, as well as Lady Wilton's bay, the Duchess of Buccleugh's, Mrs. Lytton's, Lady Anne Becket's, Lady Worcester's, or even little Mrs. Jerningham's spot.

We now arrive at not the least difficult part of our instructions, in considering the make and colour of the habit. Any thing at all outre, either in the one or the other, we should pronounce objectionable, in a general point of view—even sleeves of too ample dimensions, though in correspondence with present fashions, should be avoided; and also gilt or silver buttons, and all fanciful embroidery whatsoever. The darkest colours of blue, brown, or olive, should be preferred as the simplest, with velvet collars, or not, at the discretion of the wearer. They may be worn buttoned up to the throat, (though the effect may not be seasonable in summer,) and in that case, often give a very distinguished air to the figure, as in the instances of Lady Strachan, Lady Warwick, the Ladies Ryder; the latter, by-the-by, among the best examples of our school. The habit may be left open at the chest, according to the approved tastes of Lady Gower, Lady Georgina Fane, and Lady Brudenell; or it may be thrown entirely open, with a silk velvet vest or a fanciful pattern with fillagree buttons, in accordance with the usage of Lady Dacre, (herself a mistress in the art, and one of the finest models of female equestrian,) of her niece Miss Brande, and Miss Upton. The skirts of the habit should reach considerably below the feet, and be well poised with shot; but they should not be long enough to tempt snappish curs, or the mirage. Those worn by the Misses Montague are rather in excess of brevity; though in a canter on a gusty day they do at times display, with no inconsiderable effect, a very pretty boot and trowsers. Small shirt collars, with a silk kerchief of some showy colour, are to our thinking, much more becoming than a habit-shirt of the finest lace. We might quote high authority for fanciful colours in these matters, in opposition to the rules we have ventured to prescribe at the outset; but the rule is strengthened rather than contradicted by the exceptions. The late all-engaging and universally lamented Duchess of Rutland generally appeared in the lightest blue, covered with small silver buttons, a white hat, and very high shirt collar; but be it remembered that her grace was gifted with personal attractions that might excuse any eccentricity. Who can contemplate, with indifferent feelings, the "ensemble" of Mrs. Lane Fox, even in a pea-green habit, embroidered with black lace? or does Mrs. Arbuthnot appear to less advantage because hers is bedusted with gilt sugar-loaf buttons? Can any one forget the Duchesse de Grammont, in her puce, covered with the thickest silk embroidery? or was Lady Londonderry ever less herself, less brilliant, or less admired than in her gold-laced jacket, with a pelisse pendant from the shoulder, and shako cap, as she appeared at the review of last year? but these we conceive to be so many illustrious exceptions to the general rule we have laid down.

We now come to discuss the most important part of the whole costume, and one upon which all the rest mainly depends—the hat—which requires more judgment and more nicety of perception in its selection, than falls to the lot of many. As to its general dimensions, its apex, the height of its crown, the depth of its brim, or the unity of its entire effect; the looking-glass may be consulted for months together, when an indifferent observer will point out, at a single glance, a palpable defect before overlooked. The hat should, of course, be adapted to the height of the person, and the contour of the features. Small blue caps are worn by Lady Macfarlane, Lady Frances Gower, and several others; but the cap has too masculine and military an air; for it should never be forgotten that a lady must not, on any occasion, or under any circumstances whatsoever, abandon a strictly feminine character.

London paper.

THE GREAT CHURCH AT HAARLEM.

In the great church at Haarlem are suspended the models of three or four ships, representing, it seems, those which in the frenzy of the crusades, had been furnished by that city, and had piously forced their way, through much carnage, to the harbour of Damietta. But what must give most men greater pleasure, is a statue erected in the public square, in honour of Laurence Coster, a native of the town, said to have been the inventor of the art of printing. He holds in his hand a large type, on which is the letter A; and on the pedestal is represented a printing-press at work. It is to be feared that the 'inaudible and noiseless foot of time,' aided by the elements, must gradually undermine and destroy the effigies of the venerable printer; on which account it is to be wished the vestry at Haarlem could be persuaded to shelter their countryman in the cathedral, were it even to the exclusion of some eminent Dutch divine or cumbersome burgomaster. In a house at no great distance, a book is shown, said to be the first which Coster ever printed.

Blackwood.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

CAUSE OF CONSUMPTION.—M. Flourens, a French philosopher, with a view to ascertain the effect of climate on pulmonary consumption, procured twenty-three chickens of a month old; six he kept in a mild regulated temperature; the remaining seventeen he exposed to wet and cold; the lungs of fifteen of these soon became inflamed; six of them he then sheltered; of the eleven left exposed nine died of pulmonary consumption, and only two recovered; not one of the six originally sheltered ones became diseased; and of the six partially diseased, but afterwards taken in, two died and four recovered. The lungs of these four were examined some months after, and the remains of disease, even to suppuration, were visible. Their recovery M. Flourens attributes entirely to a timely removal to a mild atmosphere.

HOPS.—M. Denis, member of the society of agriculture of the Vosges, has published a treatise on the cultivation of hops, in which, founding upon his own experience, he recommends the substitution of iron wires for poles, for the training of the plant. These wires, formed in pieces of about three feet in length, and joined together so as to resemble a surveyor's chain, are suspended horizontally between two posts of oak, placed at the extremities of the lines of hops, and supported by wooden props at regular intervals. The hops are planted at the distance from each other of eight feet, and are each left with four shoots, which are conducted by little rods to the iron chain, along which they are trained, two in each direction. M. Denis computes that by his practice about a fifth part of the original cost of poles is saved, and fifty francs per annum afterwards for each five hundred square metres.

TO PRESERVE BLACK-LEAD PENCIL DRAWINGS.—A thin wash of isinglass may be used to prevent their rubbing out. The same effect may be produced by the simple application of skimmed milk. The best way of using this is to lay the drawing flat upon the surface of the milk, taking it up expeditiously, and hanging it up by one corner till it drains and dries. The milk must be perfectly free from cream, otherwise it will grease the paper. To prevent the lead from smearing, the loose particles should first be taken off with a dry hair pencil, or even by blowing it.

SELTZER WATER.—A very economical mode of making seltzer water is practised at Geneva. The carbonic acid gas being first obtained from lime, and afterwards purified, this gas is then forced into a large cask of water, in which is a wheel that agitates it, and causes the gas to mix equally with the fluid. The water thus saturated, is then put into bottles, which are corked in the usual way of seltzer water, and sold during the hot weather in the streets at a very low price.

METHOD OF ASCERTAINING THE PURITY OF WATER.—The purity of water is indicated by its specific gravity. By a late act of parliament it is defined, that a cubic inch of water purified by distillation weighs, at the temperature of sixty-two degrees, barometer thirty inches, exactly two hundred and fifty-two thousand four hundred and fifty-eight grains. An imperial pint of perfectly pure water weighs precisely twenty avoirdupois ounces at sixty-two degrees. Any water heavier than this must be less pure. That the lightest water is the best is an old and true principle. Pliny says that some judge of the wholesomeness of the waters by contrasting their weights. Celsus alludes to the same practice—"nam levis pondere apparet." Hippocrates thought that the best water is that which heats and cools in the shortest time; and his echo and expositor, Celsus, affirms the same thing. Hoffman informs us that rivers of a rapid current, or which fall down mountains, afford a purer water than those that are more slow; and hence, he says, that ships coming out of the river Maine into the Rhine draw more water, and sink deeper into the latter, because the waters of the Rhine fall from the highest mountains of the Grison's country.

Dr. Lardner.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Eloquence of the United States.—Seldom has a legislative assembly listened to strains of more impassioned and impressive oratory than those elicited by the late discussion in the national senate, on the resolution introduced by Mr. Foot, respecting the disposition of the public lands. How far the debate was confined to the subject which gave rise to it, or preserved a character of unity and dignified consistency, we are not disposed to inquire. We allude to the speeches of individual members, considered abstractedly in themselves, in so far as they developed the intellectual energies and resources, the moral strength and purity, and the political sagacity and patriotic aspirations of the representatives of the American people. And we advance the opinion, without fear of contradiction, that never was there displayed in any other popular theatre rhetorical talent of higher order, literary taste more refined, wit more sparkling, satire more poignant, repartee more keen, knowledge of human nature and of human history more profound and philosophical, or jealousy of the rights of men and freemen, more severe, watchful, and zealous. Triumphant and exalted must have been the rapturous delight of the speakers, as they beheld gathered around them the most brilliant assemblages which wealth, intelligence, beauty, and fashion could concentrate, and all enchained in one unbroken, continued, and almost worshipful silence. Discordant as were the opinions, varied the constructions of the import of the great charter of our rights, and reciprocally sarcastic the rejoinders of the several antagonists in this political foray, the grand and gratifying effect upon the audience, and upon all who read the recorded words—however enfeebled their impress—must be to draw stronger the bonds of attachment of every citizen of these states to the present constitution, which secures the union, and with it the liberties of his country. Different constructions may, indeed, be put upon its written letter, but its spirit—that spirit to animate and immortalize which was the aspiring and pure wish of the great father of his country, and of his noble compeers, the Jeffersons, the Hamiltons, the Madisons, the Jays, and the Clintons—is acknowledged in every bosom to be one and the same, identified with political elevation and independence, with moral and civil freedom, with intellectual advancement and general welfare. Such has been the impression left on our minds, after an attentive perusal of the speeches of Webster, Hayne, Sprague, Benton, Woodbury, &c. Well may our common country be proud of her sons, and well may she point to them with the exalted dignity of the Roman mother, who, as the chief ornament of her life, and the most precious jewel of her family honours, pointed to her virtuous, her patriotic, and her gifted offspring.

Boston Courier.—Mr. Buckingham has much cause to complain of the liberties taken with his original articles, and so has every editor who labours incessantly in mind as well as body to render his pages instructive and entertaining, not with borrowed but self-attained light; and deep is our regret that we should have been led into an unconscious act of unfairness towards so able a contemporary. But the fault was not our own. The article entitled "Hints to Janusca," we never saw in the Boston Courier; we took it second-hand from a country periodical. Were we to punish with a refusal of exchange every journal that voluntarily robbed us of the credit due for our articles, our list would soon be reduced to one-third its present size. Mr. Buckingham himself, not long since, copied into his columns, without credit, a poem which appeared originally in this gazette. We did him the justice not to entertain a suspicion for a moment of there having been an intentional injury done us on his part, because we knew and appreciated too highly his honour, honesty, and independence. Should he not have visited us with the same courtesy? In conclusion, however, we would recommend to every editor the propriety of striking from their exchange-list all those papers that wilfully and habitually purloin their articles—in other words, republish them without acknowledgment; and when Mr. Buckingham, or any other of the corps, convict us of such offence, we are ready to submit most cheerfully to the infliction of their chastisement.

Late city improvements.—Despite of the awfully dull times, the depression of trade, and the scanty circulation of money, the external aspect of this metropolis continues daily to receive new features, which replace its more ancient gloomy character, and approximate it, in our conceptions at least, to the splendid capitals of Europe. Streets, formerly narrow, short, and dingy, are widened and prolonged, and the light of heaven made to shine upon quickly rising ranges of new and lofty edifices. Our public institutions, likewise, exchange their former contracted accommodations for others more ample and worthy of their increasing influence and operations. The new City Dispensary, Clinton-hall—the Rotunda, converted into a sessions court—the opening and widening of Ann, Cedar, and Liberty streets, which formerly threaded their sinuous courses between piles of rookeries, but are now enlarged and graced by splendid rows of stores and dwelling-houses—the elevation of Justice on the cupola of the City-hall, making way for the introduction of a monitor of time, which shall speak to the eye by night as well as day—and sundry other improvements, which we have not time to mention, attest the advancement of New-York in architectural decoration and beauty.

N. B.—The Jail and Bridewell still adorn the most public promenade and thoroughfare in the city.

Miss Elizabeth Bogart.—Abounding as this country does with female poets of the first stamp of merit, we think we may without vanity claim the very best among the contributors to the New-York Mirror. Of these, and we have had repeated occasion to express admiration of the successful exhibition of their talents, Miss Elizabeth Bogart of this city, deservedly enjoys a conspicuous rank. Her pieces are frequently transplanted to the British poetic parterre, and acknowledged there to be delightful and exquisite exotics. We are pleased to perceive, both for the sake of the public and our own, that she is a frequent writer in some of the most popular of our periodical journals. When we say our own, we refer with pride to the circumstance that the columns of the Mirror first introduced the gifted ESTELLE to the acquaintance and admiration of the poetical reader. Individual praise of our own correspondents we seldom indulge in; but where merit is so conspicuous, it were insensibility and injustice not to notice its worth. Neither do we intend any disparagement of the claims of generous rivals, of whom Miss Bogart may be proud to number not a few—nor will these misunderstand the nature of the homage paid to a kindred spirit. Jealousy cannot rankle where a noble enthusiasm burns. In justification of these remarks we confidently refer the reader to the following beautiful production, which we have copied from the Rochester Craftsman:

THE ITALIAN WIFE

She sat alone—and busy thought went back,
A faithful traveller, to her native clime—
And memory's magic wand touched every scene;
And flowers, and trees, and rivers rose to view,
Beneath Italia's sunny skies. Her heart
Leaped in her bosom, as the vision grew
More bright to fancy's eye—and suddenly,
She swept the chords of her neglected harp,
And "home, sweet home," re-echoed to the sound.
Gently it died away—the swell was gone;
And murmurs sweet and low, fell on the ear,
As if Æolus had just wandered past,
And stirred the strings—so sad the symphony,
And yet so full of untaught music. Hers
Was nature's science; 'twas the soul itself,
Breathing in harmony with the deep voice
Of earth, and air, and ocean; all things fell
By the pure spirit's innate sympathies.
A wondrous gift it was, that few possessed,
Of thrilling melody; and with the power,
But seldom equalled, she had often held
Thousands in listening silence, till the charm
Grew to such ecstasy 'twas almost pain.
Columbia's children heard, and wept, and smiled,
As her soft foreign accent gave a tone
More sweet to English words—but when she sang
Within the walls of her own splendid dome,
To silent pictures, and the gilded things
Of art and luxury, her voice refused
Its compass to the strain, and breathed forth, then,
Those broken notes—

A stranger entered—one
Of her own countrymen, who came to bring Tidings from her forsaken home. He spoke
The language of her infancy—the first
In which she learned to speak, and more, to think;
The first her heart had understood and loved.
He told his tale with classic elegance—
"He'd come from Rome, and from her fathers' house,
"Her mother was no more—she slept in peace
"With her long line of ancient ancestry.
"Her sister had grown up most beautiful
"And rich in genius, the bright heritage
"Of her dear country—and her brother's name,
"Was crowned with glory in the martial field,
"And laurels fitted well his lofty brow.
"There were some palaces and temples yet
"Remaining there, unbroken but by time.
"The muses' seats were on the mountains still,
"Their favourite haunts, along the river's banks.
"The climate was as pure, the sky as blue,
"The trees as shady, and the flowers as bright
"As when she left the soil."

Emilia wept

Till feeling's tide o'erflowed in rapid words;
And from her lips rushed forth a sudden stream
Of the heart's deep unstudied eloquence.
"Speak, stranger, speak those thrilling words again.
"Oh, tell me of sweet Italy, my own,
"My native land! What mighty magic lies
"In those three simple words, 'my native land'!
"It brings associations to the heart,
"Of love, and hope, and happiness, and home;
"Of childhood's halcyon days; the gladsome hours
"Of careless mirth and youthful innocence.
"Oh Italy, dear Italy, my joy, my pride!
"Far dearer than the spirit-stirring scenes
"Of this gay city. What is this to me?
"This land of commerce and of interest—
"Can it compare with that bright spot of earth
"Where poetry and genius seem to breathe
"E'en from inanimate things?—where every breeze
"Which sighs o'er fragrant flowers, whispers some tale
"Of high-wrought fancy—while the classic streams
"And rivers, as they glide along their course
"In murmuring music woo the muses' smiles,
"Where mountains are the storied monuments
"Of ancient greatness; and each verdant vale
"A fitting home for beauty and for love.
"Begin again—repeat what you have said—
"In glowing language paint the picture o'er,
"Till every object lives and breathes before me.
"Tears will flow afresh, but heed them not—
"My heart would burst without them."

Suddenly

Another entered, with a haughty eye,
A question in his glance—'twas he whose love
First won the young Italian from her home.
The scene was soon explained—the husband spoke,
And at his voice a change came o'er her thoughts;
The images, raised by the stranger's words,
Melted away, and she was all the wife.
"Why weeps my dear Emilia? Sighs she still "For the bright scenes of childhood, for the things
"Which once, weighed in the balance with her love,
"Were light, compared to it? What feeling now
"Has wrought this change? Am I not still the same,
"And all your own, as in that blissful hour
"When you exchanged your parent's love for mine?
"My country is your country—tell me, then,
"Which of the links is broken that so long
"Has bound our hearts in one?"

She could not tell—

She had forgotten all, in those few, brief,
And happy moments—all, but the one sense
Of her heart's young idolatry. Italia's streams,
And vales, and mountains, with its azure skies,
Its bright luxuriant flowers, its palaces,
And fanes, and temples—e'en its poetry,
And eloquence, and music, all were lost
In that one dream—and such is woman's love. ESTELLE.

The American press.—All who are in the habit of reading the newspapers of this country must be struck with the truth of the following remarks from the National Gazette:

"It is to the disgrace and injury of the American press, that even moral and literary criticism should be subjected to slander; and that the defence of sound morals, or the exercise of impartiality, cannot escape the most ridiculous and enormous personal imputations, which the whole true history and position of the individual thus assailed may utterly belie."

The Count de Rossi.—The Count de Rossi, who has married Mademoiselle Sontag, is a native of Corsica, and a relation of Bonaparte by the Romolino family. He was a staff officer of Jerome at the court of Westphalia, where his sister was married to the Prince de Salm.

Countess de Genlis.—The Countess de Genlis, (the celebrated authoress of romances and novels,) attained the age of eighty-four years on Monday last, when her pupil, the Duke of Orleans, paid his respects to her.

We copy the paragraphs below from the National Gazette:

There are about forty newspapers in London, and in the country of England one hundred and thirty-seven; the whole number in the British isles is two hundred and sixty-two. It appears that eight persons, on the average, are engaged on each publication, as literary assistants; and that some papers have from fifteen to twenty persons of education and respectability thus engaged.

The London Morning Chronicle records it as "a saying in America," that no Englishman can have an insight into business till he has lost all his money.

Pickersgill is now declared to be the first portrait painter in Great Britain. In exquisite small pictures Etty is thought to be without a rival in his generation.

In the year sixteen hundred and sixty-three the legislature of Massachusetts passed the following law: "And hereafter no person whatever shall make any garment for women with sleeves more than an ell wide."

THE TYROLESE PEASANT'S SONG.

ANDANTE CON ESPRESSIONE.

Can I for - get my na - tive hills, That proud - ly rose to view, The si - lent vales, the spark - ling rills, And flow'rs that shone with dew? Can I for - get, what-e'er my lot, Where - e'er my foot - steps roam, My na - tive plains and hum-ble cot, The ear - ly scenes of home? Can

I for - get, What - e'er my lot, Where - e'er my foot-steps roam, My na - tive plains, my na - tive plains and hum - ble cot, The ear - ly scenes of home!

2d—Can I forget the tuneful birds,
That sang on ev'ry tree,

The kindly smiles, the cheerful woods,
That friendship gave to me?

Can I forget, whate'er my lot,
Where'er my footsteps roam,

My native plains and humble cot,
The early scenes of home!

ELOQUENT AMERICANS.

FISHER AMES.—Fisher Ames has been, perhaps, more celebrated as an orator than any other American, except Patrick Henry; but it is not our object to make comparisons between the distinguished men who have graced the annals of our eloquence. The person of Ames was tall, thin, and interesting; his face was not what might be called handsome, but agreeable, and full of soul. The style of his eloquence was flowing, warm, and copious, and certainly partook more of the Roman than the Grecian orator. His manner was bland, but earnest, and his whole demeanor calculated to attract the attention of all eyes. His voice was musical, and he had the command of it from the highest to the lowest note, and in all its variations it was free from monotony or false tone; for a sweet voice, he had less of sibilation than most of our orators, an evil that foreigners complain of in our language. His imagination was creative, and at his bidding new scenes arose, new beings lived, increased as he chose, and faded away at his will. He struck his hands across the chords of the hearts of his audience, and all was harmonious to his touch; but the plaintive measures were most congenial to his mind; he had nothing dark or sullen in his constitution, but there was a soft and gentle gloom that often intermingled with the light of his mind, which gave the shade of the sanctuary to the outpourings of his heart. He mourned to think that he could not fully impress on the minds of others what he foreboded for his country; the common fault of a sensitive patriot. The diseases of his corporal frame entered deeply into his mind; and amid troublesome times he mingled dark auguries for the nation. He saw, in his imagination, the myrmidons of France sweeping over his country with rapine, fire, and dagger, and the conflagration of cities filled his eyes, and the screams of dying females his ears. His countrymen seemed to him in a state of amazing apathy; and he grew almost frantic at the thought; but he mistook their cool, brave and persevering character, for want of discernment and feeling. His warning appeals, as he thought them, were all wasted on the winds, although every one listened to him with profound respect and admiration. His friends and neighbours flocked around him as a being of wonderful powers and superior sagacity; but from their habits of reasoning for themselves, they thought that all these evils might not come, and they would wait the providence of God in this as in other things; but the honour and honesty of the great man they never doubted, for he was to them an angel of light; crowded with all his gloomy thoughts for his country, he sunk to the grave; but his admirers never lost one particle of their veneration for the genius and virtues of the man.

GOVERNEUR MORRIS.—Gouverneur Morris was a splendid orator. His mind was prolific, his fancy excursive, and his information extensive. He had read books attentively, but men more thoroughly. He was well acquainted with French literature and the academicians, and had caught something of their animation and literary fervor. His figures were beautiful, his sentimental touches delicate and thrilling. No orator ever made a more successful lunge at the heart than Morris, for he pierced at will. If Hamilton was the Xenophon among our intellectual lights, as he has been called, for the neatness, purity, and perspicuity of his productions, surely his friend, Gouverneur Morris, ought to be called the Isocrates among them. He had the same splendour of imagination, and poised his sentences with the same art that is seen in the orations of "the old man eloquent." Morris's eloquence was well suited to the deliberative assembly, and to those occasions in which the heart is deeply interested. His oration over the body of Hamilton is admirable. At that moment, when the bleeding corpse was before the eyes of his countrymen, and a nation's moans were wafted on every wind from north to south, from east to west, through the country; when almost any extravagance would have been tolerated in this paroxysm of mind; for at this event the deep lamentations of the soul were commingled with the breath of execration, and there is no wild-fire like this; yet then the pathos of the author was subdued, chastened, and harmonized to the mild and hallowed doctrines of christianity:—such exhibitions are the triumphs of the god-like art, of controlling tempers, and of conquering hearts. He lived in republican struggles; in the sunshine of royalty; in the uproar of popular fury; and then in the calm of personal safety and national tranquillity; and from all drew lessons of experience, and through all carried the sound discretion of a high-minded man. Knapp.

CONFESSION.—A constant attendant at the market of Castleton, England, confessed to a respectable housekeeper, that on the morning preceding Christmas-day he sold alive two reverend geese, the united ages of which exceeded forty years!

GEORGE F. MORRIS, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

Published every Saturday, at 163 William-street, between Beekman and Ann streets.—Terms four dollars per annum, payable in advance.—No subscription received for a less period than one year.

J. SEYMOUR, PRINTER, JOHN-STREET.

NEW-YORK MIRROR,

AND LADIES' LITERARY GAZETTE.

VOLUME VII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 8, 1880.

NUMBER 39.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

STANZAS TO THE EDITOR OF THE MIRROR.

"Why, how now, brother Obadiah Wrestlelong! More wonders of the invisible world?"—Salem Witchcraft.

The muse and myself, the other day,
Held a short colloquy together;
For she sometimes calls, when she comes that way,
Though scarcely a moment she deigns to stay,
And seldom has any thing to say,
Save, "How d'y'e do—what news to-day?"
"Tis really charming weather."

She found me alone, in my elbow-chair,
(One arm has long been broken,)
In the attic, George—you well know where,
For once, last summer, I saw you there,
When you kindly offered to pay my fare,
If I'd brush my coat, and with you repair,
To breathe a mouthful of country air,
On the heights of green Hoboken.

As I said before, her ladyship came,
En dishabille, as usual,
In costume resembling the slipshod dame,
Whose Black-book sketches are known to fame;
Her robe was blue, and her hose the same,
Her sandals untied, and her gait was lame,
As she entered the room, and pronounced my name
In a manner and tone fiducial.

"Good day t'ye, Reuben—don't ask me to stay,
For I must hasten home to my toilette;
As I go out with Norna a shopping to-day,
And Hinda goes with us—besides, I must pay
A visit to Thyra—it's all in our way,
And then to Ianthé I've something to say;
Besides, I must call upon W— and F—y,
And then there would be the Old Nick to pay,
If I didn't look in upon M—s too—eigh!
But now, while I think of it—Reuben, do say,
Who is that comical C.?—I will lay
He is building a fame that will never decay;
And so is my favourite Proteus—nay,
No jealousy, Reuben, but win your own bay,
And never let envy soil it.

"Hush! don't interrupt me—there's tender ESTELLE,
"EVERARD, LARA, and ALPHA, and I—N,
And hundreds of others, are like to excel,
If they treat me politely.—But, Reuben, do tell,
If I don't appear charming in this dishabille?
"Say, why the deuce do you grin, man?"

"You look," I replied, "both ugly and old,
In these rascally dishabille dresses;
Why, when you are visiting others, I'm told,
The finest light gossamer vestures infold
That form and those limbs of such exquisite mould,
With sandals that sparkle with spangles and gold,
While a chaplet of roses and diamonds untold,
Confine those wandering tresses.

"When others petition, you make reply,
In numbers of sweetest measure,
But to me you prate, like a chattering pie,
Of shopping and visits, while here poor I,
In silence must wait your leisure!

"Why not on me such favours bestow
As your other votaries win?
Why prattle to me on subjects so low,
In a tuneless senseless din?"
"Why then you must know,"
She said with a smile,
"That, when here below,
I adapt my style
To the company I am in."

"But, jesting apart, what is it you claim?
"I'll grant the boon, I swear it,
That is, if I'm able—come, give it a name."
"Then fire me, at once," I replied, "with the flame
That animates HALLECK, and lights him to fame;
To a like dazzling summit direct my aim,
Procure for my numbers an equal acclaim;
Secure me a chaplet as bright—not the same,
And teach me as humbly to wear it."

She smiling replied, while her head she shook,
"In vain should I bid you take it,
For Apollo, when late, with a shepherd's crook,
He toy'd with a maid, by a gurgling brook,
Had concealed his lyre in a private nook,
Which HALLECK observed, and slyly took,
And none but HALLECK can wake it." REUBEN.

LINES TO MISS —.

Again, my muse, awake;
Awake thy simple lay;
Once more thy frail harp take,
To greet the fair and gay.
'Tis the last boon I implore,
'Tis the saddest and the last;
For thy chords shall sound no more,
When their jocund tones are past.
No! never pour a strain
Upon the listener's ear,
To give his bosom pain,
Or call the burning tear.
'Twas thine—what'er thine own—
To throw around the way
Of those whom thou hast known,
At least some cheering ray.
Now—silent be thy strings,
Since joy cannot inspire,
And motionless thy wings,
And desolate thy lyre.
May every chord be broken,
Thy strings all lonely rest;
And Lethe lave each token
Of scenes that once were blest.
They say the wreath is wove,
So beautiful—so rare;
From Hymen's smiling grove,
To mingle with thy hair.
They say—'twill soon be seen,
Upon thy placid brow,
With its rose and evergreen,
In their brightest, proudest glow.
Oh may they truly shine,
May no hidden cypress leaf,
In that wreath conceal'd entwine,
To shade thy brow with grief.
I would that not one cloud should rise,
To cast a shadow there;
That not one tear should dim those eyes,
That sparkle now so fair.
That not one sigh should move thee,
No! not with slightest sting;
Bright be the skies above thee,
And all thy life a spring.

And when at last its sun must set,
May lingering rays be given;
Marking to those who travel yet,
The path that leads to heaven.
Now fancy hovers o'er me,
And pictures to my brain
The scene that is before thee,
The priest—and crowded fane.
The joyous bridegroom standing near,
And dear ones at thy side;
With looks that tell how hope can cheer,
And thou—the blooming bride.
I hear the priest pronounce the rite,
I hear the faint reply,
And see the ring that sparkles bright
Upon the bridegroom's eye.
Oh! when 'tis fixed upon thy hand,
To friendship grant a plea;
While yet these loved ones round thee stand,
Breathe one kind prayer—for me.
Then be my name forgot,
My hopes—my joys—my fears—
What'er shall be my lot,
Where'er shall fall my tears.
Like the lightning's course in air,
Like the ship's track in the sea,
Let each remnant perish there,
That might wake one thought of me.
For I would that not a word,
When thy heart and home are bright,
Of me should e'er be heard,
To lessen their delight.
No! let me only find,
Though doom'd life's storm to brave,
In that unclouded mind,
Oblivion's deepest grave.
A wild, wild thought is low'ring,
And burning on my brain;
Like Etna's lava pouring
In torrents o'er the plain.
The bridal hour is past,
And gone that gladsome day—
Young Hope—too bright to last,
Has wing'd his flight away.
I see thee—but the step of care
Is marked upon thy face;
And sorrow's impress too is there,
And disappointment's trace.

Yes these, that come alike to all,
Have marr'd thy youthful bloom;
For fairest flowers must fade and fall,
And beauty find a tomb.
'Tis this—'tis this that burns my heart.
Like that flaming flood of fire;
To see earth's lovely things depart,
And with pain, convulsed—expire.

Must the dimple in that cheek,
And the sweet smile in that eye,
And that alabaster neck,
Change, wither, sink, and die?
Must that bright, that graceful form,
With which I've loved to roam,
Be a banquet for the worm,
And the charnel be its home?
Must that voice which oft has fell,
In its gentle zephyr-breath,
On my ear—like music's swell—
Be still'd at thine—oh, death?
And nature, can thy arm,
Be thus raised against thy own;
Is there to thee a charm
In thy children's dying groan?
Oh! can thy bosom feel
A wish to crush and blight;
Will a mother grasp the steel,
To pierce the good and bright?
"To the good there is no death,"
Some angel's voice replies;
"Tis but mercy's friendly breath,
That calls them to the skies."

As a mother sees her child,
By infant toils oppress'd,
And flies in pity mild,
To soothe him on her breast;
So nature will her children bless,
Will stretch her arm to save,
And from a world where sorrows press,
Will calm them—in the grave;
While high above this stormy scene,
Religion's wing will bear
Their spirits to a world serene,
And give them rapture there!
And thus, when that fair body dies,
And in the dust decays,
Oh may its ransom'd spirit rise,
To sing a Saviour's praise.
Now, fair one, fare thee well,
'Tis a sad, sad word to speak;
To me—so like a knell,
That the tear is on my cheek;
Farewell! in my inmost heart
There's a pang I cannot tell;
But I feel—I feel—we part,
Thou lovely one—farewell!

V—E.

POPULAR TALES.

CONFESSIONS OF A SUSPICIOUS GENTLEMAN.

BY LORD NUGENT.

IN TWO CHAPTERS—CHAPTER THE FIRST.

ARRIVED at that period of life when a man can no longer deceive even himself by the affectation of a long cherished youth, but, however reluctantly, is fain to enter, wigged, and the worse for wear, into the army of elderly gentlemen, I have undertaken a bitter task. In this hard moment, my situation and feelings are like those of a naughty urchin who has, by penance, to repair his past misconduct, and regain the confidence and favour of his superiors; like him, I see a new life, with all its responsibilities, opening before me. Hope animates us both: him with the earnest of plum cakes, and other indigestibles, the meed of future contrition and amendment; me with the prospect of sweets metaphorical—peace of mind, and respectability, which my youth knew not how to store up, but which my old age must now compound out of new materials, and at the expense of a great and signal sacrifice. Uncertain health, chronic rheumatism, and a marvellous weakness in the lower limbs notwithstanding, I now start for the prize of late-sought happiness, with, I believe, more ardour than the child who may reasonably calculate upon being on better terms with time in the race. "My gentle fine is this!" To write my history, to expose my faults to censure, and, what is harder yet, my absurdities to ridicule; to bow to the infliction I have wantonly drawn upon myself, and, (like my fellow-victim, the bellowing urchin) to proclaim in my anguish that I am rightly served.

I include no one in any share of the blame with myself. I do not even plead as an excuse that I derived from nature the vice which, like a baneful web, has wound itself round my habits and my existence. But this I say, and with truth, that I remember not the moment when I was free from it. From the earliest dawn of my imperfect and misguided reason, suspicion gave a colouring of its own to all my actions, and to all my thoughts. I suspected, in turns, and all together, attendants, teachers, and playmates. The joyous frank-heartedness of infancy is a bright and beautiful figure of imagination, of which I never had experience. The strong affections of youth I never felt; and the confiding warmth of manly friendship was a thing I often desired, but could not comprehend. I had no friend, and I deserved none; for, though I never wished to injure any one, still I was in a state of active and ceaseless warfare with the rest of my species, from a belief that all who belonged to it wished to injure me. Under such a delusion, how was I to entertain a generous passion or excite one? Love is the perfection of confiding friendship; I have already said enough to show that I was totally incapable of it; and to marriage I looked with a repugnance comparable only to that with which a cautious capitalist would regard the proposal of a large advance without any but personal and very precarious security. I contemplated with great alarm so wilful a risk of contentment and happiness, as the committing it to the custody of another, whom I might, too late, discover to have, all along, differed from me as essentially in views and disposition as in sex.

From this reasoning my mind naturally proceeded to a conclusion, not very uncommon, I believe, with less confirmed fools than myself. I decidedly was of opinion that every unmarried woman had designs upon me; and, worst of all, that those designs were, as the saying is, "honourable." For I knew myself to be a capital match. By dint of fearing to be the dupe of others, I always effectually bubbled myself. I was in possession of a large landed estate, besides considerable funded property; and, as is usual, when a man is jealous of letting even his nearest connexions know his income, I was unceasingly mortified by hearing it popularly represented as being much greater than it really was. I bent the whole force of my mind to vanquish the supposed conspiracies of maidens in their teens and their ties. Nor did I fear only the league formed by them with those experienced parental allies on whom nature imposes the sacred duty of planning and conducting their operations against the oppressed sex to whom I belong; but, if some over-persuaded mother, merely out of an overflowing solicitude for the fine arts, ever permitted the picture of her lovely daughter to grace the exhibition-room at Somerset-house, for the kind purpose of adding to the fame of the first portrait painter in the world; I instantly suspected the president of the royal academy of having become a fellow-conspirator with her against me; and, if ever the Morning Post, much against the wish of Mrs. —, paid a deserved tribute of commendation to the personal appearance of her darling in her quadrille dress, I instantly believed that enlightened and respectable journal to have been suborned by that simple-minded and truly fashionable lady into fitting out, in partnership with her, a joint letter of marque to capture and destroy my fortune and happiness. Furthermore, if the young lady herself, or any young lady, were commonly civil to me, I resented such conduct highly, and lost no time in showing, by some signal act of repulse, that her purpose was observed, and had failed. Did she take the opposite part? I considered her only as giving effect to a still deeper artifice, and piqued myself on announcing to her that her ambush had been detected, and that her shafts had fallen blunted from the impenetrable hide of the bear at whom she had aimed them.

In these skirmishes with society my worldly sagacity received several severe mortifications.

I had a younger brother once, a guileless fellow, who thought, in his simplicity, that the end of all wisdom was to secure happiness, and that, on the whole, a greater share of it belonged to one who, from thinking a little too well of the world, is sometimes deceived, than to one, who, from thinking a great deal too ill of the world, has through life to eat the bread of carefulness, seasoned with the bitter experience, that in a pitched battle between a sly man and sly mankind, the odds are always awfully against the contentious unit. He would have loved me if I had permitted him, and was always ready to forgive and prone to forget my injustice. He is dead! Peace be with him, even as he loved peace and wished it to others. His lot was truly happy; for he died young, beloved of all whose love was worth the having, and was spared the grief of witnessing the consummation of his brother's disgrace, or of ever knowing the bitterness of these tears with which I must have craved his pardon had he lived, and which I now offer as a fruitless tribute to the memory of his frank affection. He had not within him the spirit of distrust or envious rivalry. His only ambition was to be known by bold and generous bearing in the gallant profession which he had chosen and adorned, and he never for an instant stooped to the influence of a mean or interested desire. Poor fellow! I leave this subject, for it is a pleasure to me to praise him, and my business is self-punishment. My malignant genius disposed me to believe that this worthy creature was hoarding up his hopes of inheriting the entailed family property, and, for no other purpose than to disappoint him, did I set to work to conquer my own settled repugnance to wedlock. Love I knew not, so I seriously inclined myself to matrimony upon an impulse of the next strongest feeling to it—spite. The more resolved I grew to marry, the more did marriage become the theme of my invective, in order that I might the better disguise my intentions. One day my brother, in the openness of his heart, he told me was going to be married in a week to a girl he had long loved. "You must not press me," he added, "to mention her name to you. To own the truth, brother, she and I are equally afraid of some little peculiarities of yours, and, as some of her friends have given but a reluctant consent to our union, on account of the smallness of my fortune, we wish to avoid any suggestions being made, which might, we think, have the effect of exciting afresh a hostile spirit in them."

"Cunning brother," thought I, "and fine words these! A very pleasant scheme truly for preventing my telling her relations that I mean to keep what I have to myself! Reluctant consent with a vengeance! When I'll be bound you have taken care to say that I never mean to marry, and that (please heaven I die) you will then come in for all. But I will marry as well as you, and without farther loss of time." I allowed myself small space to pause, and went to work in earnest; for I wished to have all settled and declared on the very day of my brother's wedding. I made a list of all the marriageable women in the neighbourhood, setting down all their qualities in the inverse ratio, and weighing all their respective demerits. According to this flattering mode of computation, my choice fell upon a young girl of good connexions; pretty enough; very unassuming; and who, unlike others, had taken no trouble to be either particularly rude or civil to me. It was Christmas-time; when, as usual, parties assembled frequently at the different houses of the neighbourhood. This gave me opportunities of engaging this young lady in a conversation. I even submitted to the toil and exposure of dancing with her, and sat by her one or two days at dinner. I was charmed to find her all I could wish. My allotted week had expired, all but one evening, when, fancying the lady and the moment equally favourable, I made her a formal proposal of marriage. "Good heaven! Mr. —" exclaimed she, starting back, and fixing on me a look in which it appeared to me doubtful whether indignant surprise or suspicion of the state of my wits had the predominance, "good heaven! Mr. —, what can you mean; do you not know that I am to marry your brother to-morrow? To what could I attribute your kindness to me but to your having, as I believed, discovered our secret?"

Evil passions are rapid in their march and full of resource. I instantly concluded it to be impossible that she could continue to prefer a younger brother, after she had discovered her power to possess herself of an elder. Such was the infamous opinion I had conceived of her sex; and, in prosecution of a design still more infamous, I represented to her the advantages of a marriage with myself, and would have imputed my unnatural conduct to the force of a passion before which brotherly love, and every other love but itself, must give way. But she prevented me; and casting upon me a second look of an unmixed meaning, which I could not mistake for any thing but pure loathing and contempt, she commanded me to be silent; and, merely telling me that, out of respect for my brother's happiness, she would forbear to expose me, she left me overwhelmed with confusion, having discovered the secret of an honourable heart at the expense of my own deep disgrace; and she became next morning my brother's bride.

This was a lesson which might have opened the eyes of the blind, or restored reason to a madman. But I was incurable. I meanly relied upon her promised silence, thinking that, for her own sake, she would dread to offend me by the disclosure. I was of a sickly constitution, and it appeared to me to be reasonable that she and my brother might be looking to my death as to no remote event. This idea, once conceived, soon grew into a conviction that they were sanguinely watching every symptom as it might affect their chance of pouncing on the family property. The desire of self-preservation, strong in all men, acquired accumulated power over me; and my resolution to marry was fortified in an equal degree. I was glad to conceal my mortification and resentment by an absence from home, upon a pretence of sudden and urgent business in London. Thither I repaired, and there I remained, as in the most convenient harbour which the world affords to the thoroughly selfish; for there I was little known, and less observed. Still I went into society, my acquaintance increased, and I soon fixed my choice upon a lady, who, unhappily for herself, appeared to be well calculated to suit me as a wife. She was of what is generally called a staidier, because a rather maturer age, than the romantic girl to whom I had lately proposed myself; she had beauty, rank, and fortune, and there appeared in her no assignable motive for listening to my addresses but affection. In the uncertainty of success there was an excitement which made me look with diminished horror upon the sacrifice to which I was resigning myself. To make short of needless and very ordinary details, I content myself with saying, that after six months of prosperous courtship, I became the husband of the rich, beautiful, accomplished (and oh! how good and amiable) Lady Anne S—.

I do not say that in the probationary period I never wavered. But when at length my proposals were frankly and unhesitatingly accepted, I had indeed some grievous misgivings. Still the fear of ridicule and infamy obliged me to proceed. And now began those annoyances, dreadful enough to any man, but to one of my temper how totally insupportable! Now began the inquisition of solicitous friends and interrogatory relations. I had to own to every acre, every exchequer bill, and the true force and meaning of every newly acquired article of comfort or of show. But these were visitations to be parried; for curiosity may always be baffled by a bounce. The worst remained—a couple of inimical looking lawyers insisted, by virtue of their function, upon not allowing us to marry in peace, without a plenary confession from us both of all we were worth, in ease and in posse, and it was with the utmost difficulty, that I could contrive to deceive them, with regard to a portion of my personalities. The only thing that cheered me in all this was the repetition of the comfortable words, "my heirs," in almost every alternate line of my settlement.

Wedded at last, was I happy? Far from it! I had succeeded to my utmost expectations. I had, as I imagined, secured content to myself, and disappointment to my brother. But within my own breast was an enemy, ever watchful to convert back the elements of repose into a chaos of confusion and discomfort. My wife could not conceal the surprise and dread with which she became by degrees acquainted with the secret of that monstrous power which held me in its bondage. At first she tried ridicule, mild and friendly ridicule; too friendly to wound or to reform me; then expostulation, gentle as her ridicule had been, but grave and earnest. It failed as signally. She then gave way, gracefully, to what she saw was irremediable. She never sanctioned my follies by a compromise of her own judgment; but, as if she had wedded herself to them as well as to me, she endeavoured to shelter them from exposure, and me from the contempt and danger into which they were continually hurrying me. I no sooner had a house of my own, and an establishment of servants suitable to my fortune, than it naturally occurred to me that all servants were thieves; and dealing with my own accordingly, I discharged each in his turn, after one or two watchful and litigious months. Their strong boxes alternately disclosed their treasures before the scrutiny of successive search-warrants. I never discovered any loss of property to myself, and in my present penitence I can only hope that my temper was so publicly known that these displays of distrust never caused any loss of character to the beings who were wretched enough to serve an always unjustly suspecting master.

I know not whether I was the inventor, I certainly was a practiser, of the most odious temptations; and, after habitually leaving money, duly marked and noted, in their way, I remained perplexed to determine whether they had failed to see the bait, or had left it untouched only in hopes to lure me into trusting them at last with a more considerable prize. My house was a museum of anti-burglary intentions. With difficulty could my shutters be opened at all, so encumbered were they with expedients to prevent their being opened from without; and it was a miracle that preserved me and mine within from falling victims to the concealed explosives with which my self-defending, bell-beset, and bullet-proof chambers were nightly furnished. Nor, in ordering the internal police of my family, was I negligent of means for watching the course of opinion concerning myself. In the hope of discovering some secret in which I had no concern, and which it would have been a grief to me to become acquainted with, and, like all suspicious persons, deeming myself the subject of all thought and conversation, often would I sham sleep, or burst suddenly in upon parties in conversation, and sometimes feign to have heard some things which never had been said, in hopes of detecting others which I suspected had. But now to the bitterest part of the bitter task of confession, and to the scene of my deepest dishonour. Hitherto my wife had suffered but little from my temper, except in her consciousness of the unhappiness and disgrace in which it involved me. Against her, personally, I had as yet committed no very great enormity. But no one could live with me and escape. After two years of what might have been great happiness, I began to lay all the stores of my madness under contribution, for means to destroy whatever little repose the demon of distrust had left me—I resolved to doubt my wife's affection. I could not disguise from myself my master passion; I had too much reason to know it. I had reason also to know her to be a person of quick and searching shrewdness; could it then have been a total secret from her, even before she married me? And, knowing or suspecting it, could she have ever loved me? And then the distracting inquiry, if she loved me not, why the plague did she marry me?

THE FINE ARTS.

THE PICTURES AT THE ACADEMY.

A FLIPPANT and self-complacent criticism on paintings, interlarded with a little technical jargon, is, to real judges, of all things on earth the most contemptible and provoking. Years of study, a thorough knowledge of the principles of the art, and a familiarity with the works of its great masters, are necessary to form a complete and correct estimate of a painting, and there are but few indeed who have enjoyed those advantages. In adverting to the collection of Italian, Flemish, Spanish, Dutch, French, and English pictures brought to this country by Mr. Richard Abraham, we do not feel the least inclination to make "fools of ourselves," either by attempting to impose upon the ignorant, or exposing ourselves to the initiated, but do it solely to call the attention of strangers and the public to the fact that these paintings are now to be seen at the American Academy of the Fine Arts in the Park. We know it is very easy to on such subjects, and the catalogue we had at the door will furnish all the words and phrases necessary for such a purpose, but this we leave to more ambitious would-be connoisseurs, contenting ourselves with professing to be no judge, but a sincere and reverential admirer of the great art of painting. All, it is to be presumed, who visit this collection, will experience much gratification. Many a man may be capable of feeling and judging of the effect produced by a painting, though unable, at the same time, fully to appreciate the skill and power requisite to produce that effect. For instance, on first entering the room, all must be struck with the force and vigour of the "Spanish peasant family," by Murillo. Two of the figures appear as if they were looking directly in the face of the spectator, just as living people would look, and the contemptuous expression of the young girl's face is by no means flattering to his vanity. This expression would be very disagreeable in reality; but it excites pleasure, admiration, and astonishment, to see the looks, feelings, and features of humanity so truly and vividly stamped upon the canvass. Further on there are two glorious landscapes, almost as different as day and night, one by Jacob Ruysdael, and the other by Claude Lorraine, on which every eye must dwell with delight, and quit with regret. Then there is "The Magdalen in the Wilderness," by the immortal Titian, of which words, such as we can use, would utterly fail to convey any idea. A "Stag-hunt," by Hondius, in which the ferocity of the dogs, and the agony of the poor stag are strikingly depicted. A "Flower piece," by Recardi, and a "Fruit piece," by Elliger, have the most exquisite freshness and finish. But we might go on particularising through nearly the whole of the catalogue. Those who have not seen these pictures would do well to go and see them, and those who have, to go again.

"Tease with blame—excruciate with praise"

It is curious to observe, notwithstanding the anxiety and deep study we should suppose inseparable from this branch of the fine arts, the extraordinary longevity of nearly all the celebrated painters. Leonardo da Vinci lived to the age of sixty-seven, Velasquez sixty-six, Benardino Luini seventy, Murillo seventy-two, Hobbema seventy, Swanevelt seventy, Elliger seventy-two, De Louthembourg seventy-eight, Spagnoletto sixty-seven, Tibaldi seventy-three, Van de Velde seventy-four, Sas-soferatto eighty, Claude Lorraine eighty-two, David Teniers (the younger) eighty-four, and Titian ninety-nine!

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

WE were most agreeably surprised on Friday evening (last week) at once more beholding a goodly number of people in the theatre. This is the greatest novelty that has been witnessed there for some time past, and each component part of the audience surveyed the aggregate with many manifestations of astonishment. To the actors it must have recalled former times, when a crowded house was no rarity. It is gratifying to say that this respectable assemblage was present for the benefit of Mr. Placide, an actor whose exertions have heretofore been rewarded with more praise than profit, merely because he has invariably refused to resort to the trickery and mystification usually put in operation on benefit nights. The evening's entertainment might have well warranted the most sanguine expectations, but the weather was very boisterous and disagreeable. In the first place there was the "Caliph of Bagdad," the most popular opera that has been produced in this country; a local interlude, entitled "The First of May," and the sprightly afterpiece of "Music and Prejudice." The First of May, constructed by Mr. Clinch, of this city, is of that class of pieces where one man imposes upon another by the assumption of a quantity of characters, and is as neat and ingenious as any thing of the kind we remember to have witnessed. Placide (though we regret to see so chaste and refined an actor in this branch of theatrical business) was eminently successful in his various personations. The "Caliph," in despite of several inaccuracies, went off uncommonly well. It is wonderful to observe what effect can be given to a slight part by a clever actor. In this opera there are three characters of very little consequence in themselves, but which become exceedingly amusing in the hands of Barnes, Hilson, and Placide. In the present instance, however, Barnes took the liberty of departing from his text in order to show the depth and extent of his studies in zoology, by talking about the "proboscis of a camel;" and his familiarity with orientalisms and knowledge of things in general by swearing by "the beard of Mecca" instead of the "beard of Mahomet." This was altogether original, and not sufficiently appreciated by the surprised audience. Hilson also succeeded in eliciting much judicious approbation in the banquet scene, by speaking a whole speech with his mouth full of victuals. This simple touch of nature has been highly successful on the stage for many years, and the merit of the original conception does not belong to Mr. Hilson, but his execution of this difficult manœuvre was viewed by a large portion of the audience as a prodigious effort; many were thrown into a paroxysm of delight, which worked itself off in loud peals of laughter and clapping of hands. It showed what talent can effect when properly exercised. Mrs. Austin's Darina is delightful; that is, so far as the singing is concerned, and the acting is very tolerable. This lady was unfortunate in making her appearance first in this country in a neighbouring city instead of New-York, which materially retarded her progress to that eminence in public estimation which she has since attained. The public of this city have arrogated to themselves, with what justice we do not pretend to say, the exclusive right of deciding upon the merits of all "stars" that reach these shores; and if they are received as pure ore here, they generally pass current all over the country. Not so with those who, ignorant of this state of things, select Philadelphia or Boston as the scene of their debut; the selection itself, is by the worthy people of this city, regarded either as a tacit acknowledgment of inferiority, or a mark of contempt for their self-constituted authority, and they generally demur at bestowing their approbation, however well-deserved. Mrs. Austin was totally neglected when she appeared at the Park, and warbled night after night to empty benches. We do not know how far this amiable feeling had crept into ourselves; but this we do know, that for some time we felt a disinclination to throw in our mite of praise, and what did come was grudgingly extorted. There was, to be sure, no denying, even at first, the lady's unequalled powers of voice—a voice at once so clear, so deep, and rich—so wonderfully flexible and imbued with melody; or afterwards the skill and brilliancy with which she gave such songs as "Genius of Freedom," the "War has ceased," or the "Soldier tired;" but we were still inclined to doubt that she possessed that purity of taste, expression, and feeling, which she has since evinced in a more simple and unambitious style of music. We never remember to have heard any thing finer than the way in which she gives Bayly's beautiful and plaintive ballad, "Upon the hill he turned," in Music and Prejudice. It is lamentable to see the coldness with which this and similar songs are received by the public; of course they are not to be compared to "Betsy Baker" and "Wedlock is a ticklish thing;" but still their simple and unobtrusive merits might entitle them to a little more attention. The opening part of the duet, "Wilt thou tempt the wave with me," by Weber, introduced in the same opera, is almost equal, but in the same unpopular style. There are many fine things said about singers touching the feelings of the audience, which sound very well in the abstract, but when it comes to the proof, it appears that the majority of the audience have no feelings to touch; at least, it is curious to observe the decided preference given to songs of a light, airy description, which tinkle merrily on the ear, to those that appeal more directly to the heart: for instance, that beautiful composition in the Caliph, "Oh, father, since that fatal day," which is exquisitely sung, meets with a cold reception; while Darina's second song, "Oh, what delight the soldier knows," in every respect inferior, and which does not belong to the opera, but is merely introduced to gratify this kind of taste, elicits a rapturous encore. But this is one of the bad effects, both here and in England, of a mixed audience; in France they manage their amusements more judiciously. The French theatres are much smaller, and the company that is kept two-thirds of the time unemployed at Drury-lane or Covent-garden, would suffice for half a dozen. One theatre is devoted expressly to tragedy, another to comedy, another to music and dancing, and so on; the consequence is, that the several theatres are filled with people who come for one object. Not so in England and America, where a broad farce, an opera, and a melo-drama are frequently performed on the same evening; and the audience are composed of people, some of whom come to see one thing, and some another; and this it is that, in despite of a host of splendid critics, makes a London mob so omnipotent in the best theatres; and this it is that engenders and encourages a coarse and meretricious style both of acting and singing. It is a great annoyance to foreigners in London. We recollect hearing an intelligent Frenchman complain most bitterly on this score—"I go to de play to hear de musique," said he, "and Monsieur Liston he come and make one ugly face at de people, and all de people laugh, and, by gare, they never give oware their laugh all de night aftare." We hope, however, Mrs. Austin will not altogether relinquish the ballad style, but combine it and the bravura in her own person. All her competitors have, from some cause or other, withdrawn from the contest, and she now remains undisputed queen of song in this part of the world, unless she has met with a rival in Signorina Giulia Da Ponte, whom, as yet, we have not had an opportunity of hearing. A male singer is very much wanted at this theatre. The manager, it is true, has lately made a precious discovery of unexplored powers in this department in his own proper person, and it is whispered that he will shortly fill that vacuum himself, and make his appearance as Arbaces; but whether this is true, or whether it is only one of the flying rumours that is for ever afloat about eminent vocalists, is by no means certain. C.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE FAMILY LIBRARY.—This week the Messrs. Harper publish the three first numbers of the Family Library, containing the history of the Jews, by Milman, the author of Samor, the Lord of the Bright City, and other poems of great beauty. The plan of the Family Library is exceedingly popular in England, and we are not surprised that it is so; the subjects chosen are highly interesting, and the best writers are engaged upon them, so that nothing shall be wanting to the excellence of the work. The English and Scotch reviews speak very favourably of Mr. Milman's History, and their encomiums have all the appearance of being the honest result of careful reading. To the general reader a good history of that singular people cannot but be very attractive. The Family Library is stereotyped upon very fine white paper, and done up in brown linen, like the English edition. It will make a handsome collection, both of volumes and of matter, and no reading man's book-case should be without them.

LATE REPUBLICATIONS.—"Leonora," is the title of a recent English work from the press of E. B. Clayton of this city, by the author of "Early Education," written expressly for young ladies. It forms a handsome duodecimo volume of about three hundred pages, and from a hasty glance at its contents, we think it is well calculated to amuse and instruct those for whom it is designed.

The "Twin Sisters," a smaller work of a similar character, has lately been republished by Mr. W. Burgess. It is from the pen of Miss Sandham, and judging from the popularity of it in England, (for we have not had time to peruse it) where it has passed through sixteen editions, we presume it worthy the attention of young readers.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

THE RAMBLER.

No. XI.

THE VICTIM OF SENSIBILITY.

"Ah me! for ought that ever I could read,
Could ever hear by tale or history,
The course of true love never did run smooth."

THOMAS AUGUSTUS PHELPS was a junior clerk in a small retail store, in an unfrequented part of Maiden-lane. His salary was insignificant, and his expenses considerable; and there being no visible channel through which extraneous funds could come into his possession, how he contrived, as the saying is, "to make both ends meet," was a problem which his most intimate friends were utterly unable to solve; and was, moreover, a subject upon which, for some reason or other, he always declined throwing any light. He was a gentle and rather well-informed young man—that is, his dress was unexceptionable; his address easy, forward, and flippant; and he discoursed with uncommon fluency on a number of subjects he knew nothing about. After he had gone through the business of the day, he improved his mind in an evening by playing at billiards, and his morals by lounging about the saloons and lobbies of the theatre, from which places he criticised the performances in a very decided manner: he gave it as his opinion that Signorina Garcia could sing, and Madame Vestris dance—that "Di tanti palpiti" was "divine!" and one of Von Weber's best compositions;—and that Handel's musical melo drama of Der Freyschutz was "awful," "thrilling," "sublime," &c. But his greatest qualification was his inexhaustible fund of what is termed "small-talk!" This he poured forth on all occasions, in "one weak, washy, everlasting flood," in a way that gained him the ardent admiration of numerous young ladies, and at last made an indelible impression on the susceptible heart of Miss Julia Carmine, the only surviving child of an artificial-flower manufacturer in Division-street. Julia was a beautiful being, in the spring of life. Her features were strictly and chastely classical, excepting her nose, mouth, chin, and forehead; her eyes were exceedingly blue, her colour rich and rosy, and her auburn tresses flowed in luxuriant ringlets down her lovely neck, which was somewhat short. Nature had done every thing for her, setting aside that she wore artificial curls, and had purchased the majority of her teeth; and though her complexion in a morning was rather sallow, yet when dressed out, and seen by candle or gas-light, she was in reality a very pretty looking young woman. She had faults, to be sure—who has not? But the greatest of them were that she talked French, played on the guitar, and kept an album.

What a sacred thing is first love! and its accompanying train of inexplicable and unexplainable feelings! and how hallowed in the imagination becomes every spot connected with this purest of passions; particularly the first spot where a mutual reciprocation of sentiment took place! It is of that I am about to speak. Julia and Thomas Augustus sat alone one evening in a small arbour, or rather wooden box, in a retired corner of the "Bowery tea-gardens;"

"The moon hid her light
From the heavens that night," and a variegated lamp, attached to the front of the box, was all that shed a melancholy radiance over the scene. Both experienced sensations unknown till then, and they had each a glass of ice-cream before them.

"How beautiful is the firmament with all its countless myriads of twinkling stars," observed Thomas Augustus Phelps, looking upwards.

"Beautiful indeed!" sighed Julia.

"And this ice-cream aint so coarse neither," said he.

"No—by no means," responded she.

"Methinks," continued Thomas, "I could sit for ever thus, with thee by my side, gazing upon the blue vault of heaven, moved Julia!"

Julia did not answer, but her silence spoke more eloquently than words; she bowed her head, and it is presumed blushed, but, as the lamp wanted trimming, there was not light enough distinctly to ascertain that fact. Thomas Augustus gently drew the sweet girl towards him, and oh! extremity of bliss! she did not resist. The coldness of worldly restraint was broken down—they exchanged vows of everlasting fidelity, and Thomas was about to seal the covenant on her lovely lips, when the man that goes about to gather up the empty glasses popped his head into the box and observed, "that he did not allow of them there sort of proceedings in his garden!" Thomas Augustus would have resented this injurious insinuation on the instant, only that he was by no means athletic, and did not possess a particle of courage; so he contented himself with declaiming for some time in a style of lofty invective, and wound up by indignantly paying the man what he owed him, tucking Julia under his arm, and walking out of the shrubbery.

It is necessary, however, to premise that twelve months antecedent to the tender passages on which we have been dilating, Mr. Phelps commenced business on his own account in Canal-street. His debut was made during that auspicious period denominated the "Canal-street fever," when, in consequence of the lowness of the rents in that quarter of the city, every body flocked thither, which caused the landlords to quadruple their original demands, by which judicious proceeding they ruined their tenants and got no rent at all. He had invariably represented his affairs to Julia as being in a most prosperous state; but unfortunately, though he was a young man possessed of many virtues, a love of truth was not one of them; indeed, those who knew him best, affirmed that he was a notorious liar, and there is no reason to doubt their word. As he had started altogether on credit, and as he spent all the money that came in as the goods went out, when his bills became due, he told his creditors he was extremely sorry, but that he had no funds to meet their demands: they in return assured him that they were extremely sorry to hear it, seized upon the residue of his stock, and turned him out of doors. This was hard to bear, and he flew on the wings of love to find consolation in the society of his beloved Julia; but she was not at home. The next day he called, and still the same answer. On the evening of the third day he was admitted to her presence, but "Oh frailty—thy name is woman!" she had heard of his misfortunes, and received him with chilling politeness. The lady was not at all mercenary, but then she had found it convenient, as she informed him, to plight her virgin vows to Mr. Raphael Jackson, (familiarly termed Ralph Jackson) and that they were to be married early in the ensuing week. Thomas stood mute and motionless, for, as the poet justly observes,

"Colder than the wind that freezes
Founts, that but now in sunshine played,
Is that congealing pang which seizes
The bursting bosom when betrayed."

What barbed the dart and made the matter worse, was that this Mr. Raphael Jackson—a young lawyer with a good deal of cunning, and a great deal of impudence, consequently likely to do well in the world—was his most particular friend. He was aroused from his trance by Julia asking him if he would not "stay to tea?" this offer he indignantly spurned, and immediately quitted the premises. The next morning he found on his table an invitation to the wedding. It was, of course, never suspected that he would accept it, and was purely meant as a piece of gratuitous insolence on the part of his successful rival. But whoever calculated on his not coming, reckoned without their host. "Yes!" exclaimed he mentally, as he surveyed the perfumed rose-coloured note; "yes; I will see her once more—for the last—ay, for the last time!"

About seven o'clock in the evening of the twenty-second of April, 1827, a jovial wedding party was assembled at the house of Mr. Carmine, in Division-street, to celebrate the nuptials of his accomplished daughter. All was prepared for the impressive ceremony. The bride had got through shedding the preliminary tears usual on these occasions; the bridegroom was doing his best, as in duty bound, to look joyous and happy; the bridesmaids were tittering and laughing for some reason or reasons best known to themselves; the groomsmen were endeavouring to be uncommonly facetious, and the parson had put on a look meant to rebuke all tittering and facetiousness, when the door suddenly opened, and a figure stalked into the room. It was Mr. Thomas Augustus Phelps, but alas, how changed! He looked not like one who had come to participate in a scene of happiness. His boots were dirty, his hat was slouched over his eyes, his coat was buttoned up to his chin, his cravat was far from clean, and his hands were stuck in his trousers' pockets. The company recoiled, the bride uttered a faint exclamation, and the bridegroom stepped forward and demanded in a bullying tone of voice "the meaning of this extraordinary intrusion?" Phelps spoke not a word, but drew from his right-hand coat pocket the perfumed rose-coloured invitation note, and presented it to the bridegroom. He then drew from his left-hand coat pocket an uncommonly large horse-pistol, upon which Mr. Raphael Jackson retreated with great precipitation. Phelps deliberately cocked the pistol, and an uncommon curiosity took possession of the guests to see whether he intended to sacrifice the bride, the bridegroom, or himself. This interesting suspense was soon ended. He slowly brought it in a line with his own forehead, and was proceeding to pull the irrevocable trigger, when an arm from behind stayed his rash hand. A struggle ensued, and dreadful to relate, in the scuffle the pistol went off full in the face of one of the fair young bridesmaids. Fortunately she sustained no injury, which led to a suspicion that the instrument of death had been loaded with an eye to safety. Upon this the gallant bridegroom experienced a revivification of valour. He stepped forward, informed the unfortunate Phelps that he should hear from him in the morning through the medium of Mr. Hays, and peremptorily ordered him to leave the room. The poor bride, who during this scene had been rather in the back ground, thought she now perceived a favourable opportunity for display, and made an ineffectual attempt at getting up a fainting fit, but her warmest admirers were obliged to admit that it was a failure. Mr. Jackson once more asked Mr. Phelps whether he intended to quit the room, or whether he was waiting for him (Jackson) to put him out. Phelps scorned to reply; a peculiar expression flitted over his pale features, he cast an indescribable look towards the bride, and then did as he was desired.

On the following day, about noon, a gallant Liverpool packet was passing Sandy Hook, outward bound. On her deck stood the principal actor in the intended tragedy of the preceding evening. His disappointment in love, and some fraudulent transactions connected with his late failure, had induced him to seek relief in change of scene. The breeze was fair, and the vessel was careering "o'er the glad waters of the dark blue sea" at the rate of about nine knots an hour. Phelps stood at the stern of the ship gazing intently on the land of his forefathers, which was fast fading in the distance. A slight blue line at the verge of the horizon was all that remained to him of the home of his childhood—the scene of so many balls, and public, and parties—where he had danced, and sung, and played at billiards, and eat oysters when a mere boy; the tears started to his eyes, he leaned his head over the ship's side, and in a voice choked with agony, or something else, he exclaimed—

"Oh, captain, I am very sick!"

The captain, in that cheerful tone of voice with which a man, who has nothing the matter with him, consoles another, replied, "Never mind, sir—you'll be better in a day or two—haul taut the fore top-sail halliards there!"

This to Phelps, whose face exhibited as many shades of blue, and black, and green, and yellow, as the back of a dying dolphin, was great consolation. Indeed, I have myself often had occasion to observe the happy effects of similar scraps of comfort applied to sea-sick passengers. It is so pleasant when you are suffering under this most horrible of afflictions—when every minute seems an age, and every hour an eternity—to be told, "never mind, sir, you'll get over it in less than a week, maybe!"

Time rolled on, and nothing reached the American shores concerning the fate of Thomas Augustus Phelps, except a flying report that he had been undergoing a course of exercises in the Brixton tread-mill, when one Sunday morning, in the autumn of the year 1829, a shabby-genteel sort of personage was seen strutting up Broadway. It was Phelps. The wooden-paling of Trinity church yard was at that period prostrate, and the cast-iron railing had not been erected, so that there was no obstacle to a free ingress to and egress from the burying-ground. Phelps wandered in among the tombs—a presentiment of some overhanging evil weighed heavy upon his breast, and before he had proceeded far he came to a plain marble slab almost overgrown with grass. A strange curiosity seized him; he knelt down and parted the rank weeds which overshadowed it; a sunbeam at that moment darted precisely on the place, and he saw, carved in legible German-text, the simple inscription "Julia." He was indescribably affected; and yet he felt a melancholy pleasure in thinking that she had too late become sensible of his merits, and pined into the grave in consequence of his absence. While indulging in this train of reflection a troop of little boys, attracted by the extraordinary spectacle of a man upon his knees in a church-yard, began to gather round, shouting and pelting him with earth and small pebbles. He arose to reprimand them; but there having been a heavy shower of rain, and he having white duck trousers on, the effect his kneeling had had upon his smallclothes, can, like a young heroine's feelings, be more easily imagined than described. Those smallclothes instantly became an object of universal observation, and the little boys shouted and pelted more than ever. Phelps was exasperated beyond measure; he seized one of the young miscreants, shook him well, and threatened the most dreadful corporeal chastisement if he did not desist.

"Hurrah for Jackson!" exclaimed the young rebel, nothing daunted.

"Hurrah for Jackson!" chimed in his companions in evil-doing. This pointed, though unintentional allusion to his rival, at once unnerved Phelps—recollections of former insults and injuries came over him, and he strode from the burial-ground, the boys hurraing all the while at his coat-tail; when lo! who should be seen issuing from the church-porch but Mr. Raphael Jackson himself with his own Julia, now Mrs. Jackson, hanging on his arm! This was too much—so then it appeared she had not pined away in his absence—she had not died—and he had been kneeling by the side of some one else's Julia! They passed him without speaking, he muttered dreadful imprecations to himself, and bent his way down Wall-street.

Phelps is now only the wreck of his former self, though he is more corpulent than he was wont to be, yet it is not a healthy corpulency. He still wears his hat knowingly adjusted on one side of his head, but his apparel is ancient and rusty; he drinks like a fish, talks politics incessantly, and his shirt-frill is much bedaubed with snuff. What will be his final fate depends upon ulterior circumstances; at present it is enveloped in the mists and darkness of futurity. C.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

PORTRAITS OF CELEBRATED CHARACTERS.

THE PACHA OF EGYPT.

THE present situation of Egypt and the measures of its ruler, Mehemed Ali, occupy the attention of the civilized world, and are of importance to this country, though remote; because if Egypt should shake off its dependence on the sultan, our commercial relations would assume a different complexion.

To judge of an important personage placed at the head of a nation, reference must be had to the events of his life, and as biographies of great men are the order of the day, we cannot, as we think, devote a column or two more profitably than in referring to the history of the celebrated personage who is now the viceroy of Egypt, and who seems by his measures to be giving a new and extraordinary impulse to the resources of that country.

It is useless to trace the causes which led Mehemed Ali, an Albanian soldier, to the summit of power. Courage and decision of conduct, self-possession, and intrigue, are qualities in a muselman which generally lead to promotion. Civil war was raging in every part of Egypt, when Mehemed Ali was appointed viceroy, (1806;) the inhabitants were divided and dissatisfied, and the treasury was empty. The first step of the new pacha was to obtain money without imposing new taxes, a very difficult and delicate task. He demanded of George Gohary, the general intendant of Egyptian finances, the settlement of his accounts, and received from him four thousand eight hundred purses, of twelve hundred and fifty dollars each. Provided with the means of paying his troops, he directed his attention to his most formidable enemies, the mamelukes, and commenced his operations with a stratagem. He persuaded their beys to come to Cairo, under a promise that they should be amicably received, and by a part of his own force as an escort.

The mamelukes were caught in the snare; but on their arrival at Cairo, not finding the escort promised by the pacha, they dispersed through the streets to seek their friends, when they heard the reports of muskets from the walls and the houses. They turned, but retreat was cut off; many fled to the mosque Bar-boa-Kyeh, others, towards the great gate victory, a third party scaled the walls and gained the fields—these were safe—the rest were taken prisoners. Mehemed Ali, to profit by the panic of the mamelukes, sent a detachment of fifteen hundred troops, under Abdyn-Aga, against Ibrahim-Bey, who lay entrenched at Torrah, but his troops were defeated with the loss of five hundred men. The mamelukes were then under three chiefs, Elfi-Bey, Ibrahim-Bey, and Bardessy. Their united forces amounted to eight thousand men, but their principal reliance was on England. British emissaries had flattered Elfi-Bey with being made viceroy. The English agent at Constantinople used every effort to dispose the sultan to favour Elfi, and this was done when England, through the aid of Elfi, meditated the conquest of Egypt, which was considered an easy task. Neither Mehemed Ali nor the mamelukes had the least suspicion of the designs of England, and the former had retreated into Upper Egypt, where Mehemed had sent two hundred troops, under Yassy-Bey. These were likewise defeated. Elfi captured Tayoun, and ravaged the country as far as Gizith. Mehemed, by no means discouraged, sent a third expedition of three thousand men, but with no better success; they were attacked by Elfi-Bey, and defeated with loss. Elfi was considered himself sufficiently strong to march for Lower Egypt. The plans of England for the conquest were now ripe, and the mamelukes, flattered with the speedy assistance of Great Britain, prepared to besiege Demanhour, in Lower Egypt. The English cabinet, however, before attempting hostilities, endeavoured to place things on a footing so as to secure an easy conquest. The English ambassador represented to the Porte that Elfi-Bey was the only man capable of insuring peace in Egypt, and the removal of Mehemed Ali was determined upon by the sultan.

The Capudan-pacha was ordered to sail for Egypt. He landed at Alexandria with three thousand troops, and sent an officer to Mehemed Ali, with orders to repair forthwith to Alexandria, he having been appointed pacha of Salonique, and the fleet would land him at that place. Mehemed Ali received the messenger with profound reverence, assured him of his entire obedience to the will of the sultan, but that the troops, to whom he owed six thousand purses, opposed his departure. He had so sooner spoken than his friends surrounded the messenger, he himself glided from the apartment, and convoking the chiefs of his troops, he informed them of the message. None of the officers would consent to his departure. "If it is your wish that I should remain with you," said Mehemed Ali, "and continue your companion in arms, then swear by the koran that you will not abandon me; that you will die, if necessary, for the cause we defend." Seventy chiefs swore accordingly in the ancient manner of the Albanians, by passing their hands one after another over a sabre held by the two oldest chiefs. To give a proof of their fidelity and confidence they presented Mehemed Ali with two thousand purses, which, with considerable treasures of his own, he immediately sent to Constantinople; at the same time he did not neglect his military preparations, his visits to the fortifications and places of resort in Cairo to make himself familiar with public opinion. After these measures he invited the sheiks and ulemas to his palace. He represented to them that the mamelukes were on the eve of recovering their former power in Egypt, and prevailed upon them to sign a petition to the divan, in which they represented the beys as the authors of all the evils which had befallen Egypt: declaring that the taxes levied by the pacha had been with their consent, for the benefit of the country and the destruction of its enemies.

While the memorial was on its way to Constantinople the sheiks and principal inhabitants represented to the capudan-pacha that the contemplated change would plunge Egypt into new disorders; the capuden-pacha insisted upon obedience to the orders of the sultan. Mehemed Ali, in the meanwhile, had hastened his military operations, had sent his kya against Elfi-Bey, (who was besieging Demanhour,) to prevent his junction with the troops of the capudan-pacha. The impetuosity of this officer, however, instead of watching the movements of Elfi, led him to an attack, in which he was defeated, and forced to retreat. The capudan-pacha interfered, and ordered the garrison of Demanhour to surrender to Elfi; but these soldiers, devoted to Mehemed Ali, refused, and continued to defend the fortress.

One of the conditions which the porte had made for the re-establishment of the beys was the payment of fifteen hundred purses to the treasury of the grand vizier. This sum was to be paid by Elfi-Bey, Ibrahim, and Bardessy. The latter two refused to pay their proportion of the bonus, and the French consul laboured with all his might to support the interests of Mehemed Ali. The capudan-pacha, seeing the military preparations of the viceroy, and the reluctance of the beys to pay the amount decided upon, began to relent. He had received instructions to act according to his best views. It was agreed that Mehemed Ali should make a present of four thousand purses to the sultan, and send his eldest son, Ibrahim-Bey, as a hostage to Constantinople. This arrangement was determined upon, and the Turkish squadron weighed anchor and sailed. Mehemed Ali, to procure the stipulated sum, laid contributions on the wives of the beys, copts, and the christians of Damas, who were in Cairo; but he had scarcely escaped this danger, which threatened both his empire and his neck, when a second presented itself, in the mutiny of the Turkish troops. They had been for some time dissatisfied with the predilections shown by Mehemed for the Albanian troops, and were on the point of joining the mamelukes. Elfi-Bey was still before Demanhour; Bardessy had fallen sick at Maufalaut, and died. It was now that Mehemed Ali became well informed of the plans of England: to bring Elfi to a decisive battle, and thus give encouragement to his dissatisfied troops before the arrival of the English, was of the utmost importance. The mamelukes, in want of provision, had retreated from before Demanhour to Upper Egypt, and had passed Gizith, a few days ago, to the south of the probably from poison. His army had consisted of eight thousand men, among whom there were eight hundred mameluke cavalry, one thousand Turks and Albanians, and a good park of artillery. Against this army, greatly dispirited by the death of their leader, Mehemed Ali advanced. He had departed from Cairo on the twelfth of February, eighteen hundred and seven, at the moment when he was officially informed of the declaration of war of England against the porte. The time was precious: he promptly gave orders to his kya to watch the coast, reinforce the garrison of Rosetta and Damietta, and then started with six thousand troops, his provisions being carried up the Nile in armed boats.

He met with the army of the beys at Mangabet. The stifling heat and clouds of sand prevented both armies from engaging until sun-set, which had scarcely taken place when the troops met in the darkness of the night. After a most obstinate resistance, the mamelukes were defeated.

Mehemed Ali, desirous of profiting by his victory, offered favourable terms to the beys, provided they would join him against the English. It was not his intention to make use of their forces, but to keep them in suspense. In this he succeeded. The dispersed mamelukes united again, and it was agreed that each army should march down on either bank of the Nile; the pacha on the right, the beys on the left.

While Mehemed had dealt this severe blow to the mamelukes, the English fleet appeared before Alexandria, commanded by Admiral Lewis, (seventeenth of March, eighteen hundred and seven,) who sent a messenger to inform Osmyn Aga that he intended to take possession of Alexandria, in order to prevent its being occupied by the French. General Fraser disembarked his division of six thousand men; the place was given up without resistance, and the garrison, consisting of three hundred men, were made prisoners, and sent to Malta. The necessity of procuring provisions, together with the representations of the English consul, determined the English commander to send a detachment of two regiments, under General Wacop, to seize Rosetta. The town surrendered without resistance—the citadel resisted. The soldiers had no sooner entered the town than they dispersed, when Ali Bey, who had watched the moment, attacked them briskly from all sides at the head of five hundred men; he took one hundred and twenty prisoners, and killed the greater part of the rest.

General Fraser, desirous of effacing the stain which the military renown of his troops had received, ordered General Stewart to march against Rosetta, (with four thousand men and six field-pieces,) who erected batteries on the heights of Aboumandour; and five companies, under Major Wogelsand, were detached to take a strong position in the village of Hamed.

Mehemed Ali, in the meanwhile, returned from his victorious expedition. When he arrived at Cairo he received the felicitations of the ulemas and sheiks, with their officers, to march against the English. "My troops," said Mehemed, "are sufficiently numerous and sufficiently brave to ensure victory; it is enough, if the people assist me with money." Mehemed put the capital in a state of defence, repaired the fortifications erected by the French, and built new ones. His preparations being completed, he gave orders to his troops to march; they consisted of six thousand men, who marched to Menoaf, and separated. Hassan-Bey, with three thousand men, passed over to the left bank of the Nile, while the kya pacha continued on to the right. The inhabitants had raised nine hundred purses, which they offered to Mehemed, while they at the same time continued to flatter the mameluke beys with the pacific intentions of the pacha, so strongly had this crafty warrior and politician insinuated himself into the good graces of his subjects.

Hassan-Pacha had arrived before Hamed, where the English were posted, and he advanced forthwith, with a body of infantry and cavalry, against their strong position. He was repulsed; one company, however, of the English, in the heat of pursuit, detached itself from the rest, which was surrounded by Egyptian cavalry, and cut to pieces. Some taken prisoners, with the heads of those they killed, were marched to the camp of the kya, who, burning with desire to distinguish himself in like manner, crossed the Nile in the night, and advanced towards the English position.

Major Wogelsand had been reinforced by three companies of the thirty-fifth and seventy-ninth regiments; his whole force was about one thousand men, while the Egyptians was about three thousand, divided into three bodies, at a considerable distance from each other. The Egyptians advanced with impetuosity. The first corps of two hundred men, commanded by Major Moore, was attacked and cut to pieces; a few

Colonel M'Leod, formed themselves into a square, and by a brisk fire forced the Egyptians to retire behind the heights of Hamed; but being repeatedly harassed, he began to retreat to the main body, under Major Wogelsand. No sooner was this movement made than the Egyptians rushed from every side. Colonel M'Leod received a deadly wound, the whole was cut to pieces; only Captain M'Kay and seven men escaped to Major Wogelsand, who having formed his troops into a square, on unequal ground, was after an obstinate resistance compelled to surrender. General Stewart on the news of this disaster, his cannon, destroyed his ammunition, and began his retreat. In this he succeeded, though not without being harassed by the Egyptian troops. He however arrived at Aboukir, where he embarked for Alexandria, and on his arrival they cut the dyke which connects the city with the mainland, to secure their position. Finding they had to deal with a spirit not easily subdued, it was resolved to send General Frazer to treat upon the evacuation of Egypt. The answer of the pacha was, that he was going to Demanhour, where he would treat with the English; there was no alternative, and general Sherbrooke was dispatched with full powers. He demanded the release of the English prisoners, which was granted, on condition that Alexandria was forthwith evacuated, and left in as good condition as it was found. The pacha on the last visit of general Sherbrooke, presented him with a fine Arabian steed, and his officers with suitable presents. "The friendship of England," said this crafty politician, "was of high value to him, and he hoped in future that a more friendly disposition would exist towards him." Thus ended the first and most dangerous exploit of this renowned man.

We are not of opinion that Mehemed Ali will break with the ottoman porte, unless driven to that course by the sultan. He will rather strengthen his interests with the people, attach them to his person, and establish an independent kingdom for his son in preference to himself. This son, Ibrahim Pacha, celebrated in the war in Greece, has all the talents of his father with a much better education: and to him is ascribed the merits of advancing the agricultural interests of that country. Egypt from its vicinity to the Persian Gulf and the East Indies, is highly important to the United States, and we should endeavour to cultivate a friendly understanding with the pacha, in case political events should throw us out of the regular trade beyond the Cape of Good Hope. S.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE PARTERRE.

A SEMI-MONTHLY publication in Hartford, Connecticut, bearing the above title, has been discontinued for the want of patronage. In his valedictory, which we give below, the editor has hit off the miseries of editorship to the life. He deserves a better fate, and will no doubt gain it if he sticks to his resolution, and makes no more attempts to obtain editorial celebrity. Miner's Journal.

"If I am so quickly done for,
I wonder what I was begun for."

We will fiddle no longer without pay. Here we have been "moiling and toiling" to enlighten the world for the last four months, and how many of the world, think you, reader, have subscribed for our periodical? Two—on our veracity only two subscribers (and they have not paid,) did we have to support our publication through four numbers. Since we have issued a prospectus, seven have been added, making a grand total aggregate of NINE! Let us see. Nine times one dollar and fifty cents, is thirteen dollars and a half per annum. The expense of each number is about twelve dollars. Twelve times twenty-six is three hundred and twelve dollars a year. Bright and cheering prospects, really. It needs no very profound logic to discover that our profits would be all the wrong way. In the "beautiful" language of that "distinguished bard," "J. O. R." our affairs would "soar downwards." Here then we stop. Stick a crowbar there, neighbour. Mr. Public, we have done with you: we shake our fist at you—yes, you great lubberly old fellow, we shake our fist at you.

We now flourish our pen on the last editorial article that we shall ever indite. Perhaps the reader may respond—"for this and all other mercies we give thanks." But we care not. If necessary we will dig ditches for a living, or go on a missionary tour, but as for editing a paper—we have done with it—for ever. When we ever take up the editor's quill again, may our right hand forget its cunning. Let what will come we meddle not with it a second time. We had frequently read long and dolorous articles on the miseries of editorship, but always laughed at them, as merely written to make a paragraph; but in all the miserable dogs' lives that ever man thought of, there is no parallel to it.

NEWSPAPER POETRY.

A fair correspondent, says the New-York American, whose name is as a star to our readers, has certainly in very pretty and natural lines, told a tale, that all will read, and none, of course, believe—at least none of the sterner sex. We should be glad often to see this planet illuminating our world of types and paper.

MR. EDITOR—I send you the newest words to a favourite air. You can assure your readers that nothing personal is intended, for none will believe that a girl of seventeen can be found desirous to be married. I am sure I am not; and although I may sing thus—it's all a "hum," I assure you. *

The winds of March are humming
Their parting song—their parting song,
And summer's skies are coming,
And days grow long—and days grow long.
I watch, but not in gladness,
Our garden tree—our garden tree;
It buds, in sober sadness,
Too soon for me—too soon for me.
My second winter's over,
Alas! and I—a lass! and I
Have no accepted lover;
Don't ask me why—don't ask me why.

'Tis not asleep, or idle,
That love has been—that love has been—
For many a happy bridal
The year has seen—the year has seen.
I've done a bride's-maid duty
At three or four—at three or four;
My best bouquet had beauty;
Its donor more—its donor more.
My second winter's over,
Alas! and I—a lass! and I
Have no accepted lover;
Don't ask me why—don't ask me why.

His flowers my bosom shaded,
One sunny day—one sunny day.
The next, they fled, and faded,
Beau and bouquet—beau and bouquet.
In vain at balls and parties
I've thrown my net—I've thrown my net;
This waltzing, watching heart, is Unchosen yet—unchosen yet.
My second winter's over,
Alas! and I—a lass! and I
Have no accepted lover;
Don't ask me why—don't ask me why.

They tell me there's no hurry
For hymen's ring—for hymen's ring,
And I'm too young to marry—
'Tis no such thing—'tis no such thing.
The next spring's tides will dash on
My eighteenth year—my eighteenth year;
It puts me in a passion—
O dear, O dear!—O dear, O dear!
My second winter's over,
Alas! and I—a lass! and I
Have no accepted lover;
Don't ask me why—don't ask me why.

PAINTERS, SCULPTORS, AND ARCHITECTS.

BY ALLAN CUNNINGHAM.

MR. CUNNINGHAM is right to strike while the iron is hot, and it is with feelings of real pleasure that we record the publication of his second volume. Mr. Cunningham will not lose ground in this his second step, inasmuch as his second volume is fully more entertaining than his first.

With the characters of the artists whose lives are here recorded, we are most of us familiar. With their works many of us are well acquainted; and anecdotes of them or theirs sound to our ears as tales of persons and things with which we are, more or less, familiar. This is no slight "ground of vantage." In hearing a good story of a celebrated artist, one of whose pictures hangs in our dining-room, there is (to speak a truth) a three-fold interest. It adds a grace to the artist, to the picture, and, last, though not least, to the possessor, a matter not to be overlooked; and as some of the pictures or engravings of the artists recorded in the present volume belong or are well known to most of us, we suspect that they who have read Mr. Cunningham's first volume will read his second, and that they who have read neither may now, probably, read both.

It is time, however, to give our readers some insight as to the contents of the present volume. They comprise the memoirs of West, Barry, Blake, Opie, Morland, Bird, and Fuseli. To show the pleasant manner in which these several worthies are treated of, we must go to the book itself.

Of West, who, for a quaker and an American, was a good courtier, and his good-natured patron George the Third, Mr. Cunningham relates a pleasant anecdote:

"When the king grew weary of courts and camps and battles, the observing artist took new ground, and appealed to the religious feelings of his royal patron. He suggested to the king a series of pictures on the progress of revealed religion. A splendid oratory was projected for their reception, and half a dozen dignitaries of the church were summoned to consider the propriety of introducing paintings into a place of worship. 'When I reflect,' said the king, 'that the reformation condemned religious paintings in churches, and that the parliament in the unhappy days of King Charles I. did the same, I am fearful of introducing anything which my people may think improper. Will you give me your opinion on the subject?' After some deliberation Bishop Hurd delivered, in the name of his brethren and himself, their unanimous opinion that the introduction of religious paintings into his majesty's chapel would in no respect whatever violate the laws or usages of the church of England. 'We have examined, too,' continued Hurd, 'thirty-five subjects which the painter proposed for our choice, and we feel there is not one of them but may be treated in a way that even a quaker might contemplate with edification.' The king conceived this to be an ironical allusion to West, and was a little nettled. 'The quakers,' he replied, 'are a body of christians for whom I have a high respect; I love their peaceful tenets and their benevolence to one another, and but for the obligations of birth, I would be a quaker.' The bishop bowed and retired."

Of the violent and irascible Barry, Mr. Cunningham gives a favourable account, and pronounces him to be "the greatest enthusiast in art which England ever produced!"

One of the most interesting portions of the present volume is Mr. Cunningham's account of Blake, the artist and poet. Of this strangely constituted man it may be said that he had the power of acting rationally during the day, and going mad in the evening. He could keep for twelve hours on the windward side of the verge of insanity, and then walk deliberately over it. He was evidently afflicted with that disease of the nervous system which causes visual spectra to arise before the eye, and was without the knowledge or strength of mind to know his disease. He believed in his own visions, and painted portraits of the characters whose apparitions he thought he saw. This singular man was a poet of no mean order, and had he lived in times when poetry was less common or better appreciated, might have had his name and fame.

The following beautiful passages are quoted by Mr. Cunningham. They were written when he was under twenty, and occur in a dramatic poem, entitled Edward the Third. Explore the circle of English dramatic poetry, and it will be found difficult to surpass them; for, strange to relate, his youthful poetry, in which he might have been expected to be found wildest, seems to have been the most perfect and best considered of all he did, whether in authorship or painting.

Sir Walter Manny, on the eve of the battle of Cressy, is conversing with Sir Thomas Dagworth:

"O! Dagworth, France is sick. The very sky,
Though sunshine light, doth seem to me as pale
As is the fainting man on his death-bed,
Whose face is shown by light of one weak taper.
It makes me sad, and sick unto the heart—
Thousands must fall to day!"

Sir Thomas answers:

"Thousands of souls must leave this prison house
To be exalted to those heavenly fields
Where songs of triumph, psalms of victory—
Where peace, and joy, and love, and calm content—
Sit singing on the azure clouds, and strew
The flowers of heaven upon the banquet table.
Bind ardent hope upon your feet like shoes,
And put the robes of preparation on,
The table it is spread in shining heaven.
Let those who fight, fight in good steadfastness;
And those who fall shall rise to victory."

These poems are little known, and yet "the schoolmaster is abroad," forsooth! He has forgotten one of his implements.

Of the child of nature, Opie, Mr. Cunningham speaks much and well, though not more than enough. Opie studied nature; and as she ever does by those who worship her, she amply repaid him. Opie's pictures were drawn from nature, and from nature only, and the children which she owns do not die. His admirable portrait of Holcroft was in the exhibition of ancient masters, in this town, which closed the other day.

Of George Morland—that sad proof that the greatest talents may be united to the most debasing vices, we wish not to speak—he is best known by his works, and well by them only.

The last name in this volume is Fuseli. He was a "touchy, testy, pleasant fellow," a better scholar than a painter, and a greater wit than scholar, which is saying a great deal. He partook a little of the Barry school—and, to confess a truth, we prefer his fancy to his imagination—and would rather hear one of his keen, laconic witticisms, than see a whole gallery of his sprawling, impossible ideals. Tyne Mercury.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Prince's Linnæan Botanic Garden.—This celebrated establishment, the most extensive in the United States, where are assiduously gathered together all the varieties and beauties of the vegetable world, is so well deserving of notice, that we think a short history of its progress will be interesting to our readers; especially at this season of the year, when the pleasant spring time is awakening the slumbering mysteries of Flora, and all kinds of horticultural employments become sources of pleasure.

We are pleased to observe the increasing taste for gardening pursuits; still there is a wide field open for improvement. Many of the villas and dwellings in the vicinity of New-York are utterly destitute of all floral advantages; and not a few exhibit great slovenliness and an indifference to exterior ornament. Nothing, we are persuaded, can impart so endearing a charm to a country residence, as a tasteful assortment of shrubs and flowers.

The horticultural society of this city has probably been productive of some benefit; but we think more might have been accomplished. Emulation is the grand principle in all these matters, and often obtains unhelped for excellence. Regular meetings and premiums for the best of every thing in its season, will call forth more wonders than hundreds of the most glowing descriptions. We have an endless variety of soil and climate, and here is a garden containing the choicest of all the fruits and flowers under the sun: of course we presume no other inducement can be necessary to those who are furnishing their gardens and pleasure grounds.

The Linnæan botanic garden was established about the middle of the last century, by William Prince, the father of the present proprietor, at a time when there were few or no establishments of the kind in this country. A nursery of considerable extent had been formed by his uncle, long previous; but it remained for his successor to establish it on a more regular and extended basis, by importations from foreign climes, and by a concentration of the various productions of our own country. His catalogues, published at that early period, comprised several hundred very choice species and varieties, and hence arose the first extensive fruit collection in America. Practical horticulture being at that day quite a novelty, his garden early attracted the notice of persons of taste and science, and from it were disseminated throughout Europe a large number of the vegetable productions of the western world. The location may, on all accounts be considered the most eligible in the United States; with a proximity to the ocean on the one side, and to the East River on the other, and a free and open exposure on all points, accompanied by the particular advantage of being at the same time so far north as to acclimatize the trees to any still more northern section of our country; which circumstances united, are calculated to give to them a great degree of hardihood, and consequently to render them extremely eligible for a removal to other localities, or to support the rigour of less favoured regions; and trees thus hardened by nature, are also found to succeed best in the southern states.

The venerable founder, after having acquired for his garden an extensive fame, died in the year 1802, at an advanced age, leaving his son in the possession of his collection; who has, at a great expense, imported from almost every country in Europe, from South-America and the Indies, and also from Asia and Africa, such trees and plants as were best calculated to improve and ornament the orchard, the garden, and the greenhouse.

This botanic garden, and the nurseries attached thereto, now cover an extent of upwards of forty acres, and contain about ten thousand species and varieties of trees and plants, and from being the most extensive in America, and forming the source for distribution annually of thousands of exotic and native productions to every section of the Union, and to every part of the world, and also being founded on a much more permanent basis than generally attends establishments of the kind, have justly been considered as a national institution. The greenhouse department is on a very enlarged scale, and comprises six very extensive hot-houses, the whole containing from twenty to thirty thousand plants in pots. The number of gardeners employed throughout the summer season averages rather less than forty, but at some periods has exceeded that number. In England, their most extensive nurseries have a large portion of their grounds occupied in rearing seedling forest trees for timber plantations, which culture consequently renders a great space of ground and much labour necessary there, for what would here be deemed absolutely useless. At the period at which this garden was commenced, few of the finer fruits of Europe had yet found their way to America, and no person had paid any attention to the amelioration or improvement of such as our own country afforded; but, at the present time, we have not only by far the greater part of the most celebrated fruits of Europe and Asia, but can also boast the origin of many which rival those of the old world, and which are sought after with avidity by the inhabitants of the eastern hemisphere, and are considered by them as valuable acquisitions to their already great collections. Visitors are allowed free access to the garden on all days except Sunday, and scientific gentlemen forming herbaria are presented with fresh specimens of different plants.

At the head of Flushing Bay lies a wide expanse of meadows, around which arises an amphitheatre of gently undulating hills. On one of these stands the village of Flushing, and here the Linnæan garden is situated, at a distance of three miles from the Sound or East River, and nine from the city of New-York.

There is a constant intercourse by steamboats during the summer, and by stage in winter; but we understand it is in contemplation to establish a steam-boat line which will run uninterruptedly.

Life of Paul Jones.—Jenette Taylor, the niece of John Paul Jones, proposes to publish the memoir of that celebrated individual. From the prospectus before us, we are inclined to believe that this will be an interesting work, and if the fair publisher redeems her promise, she will deserve much of the American public. A full and authentic biography of this naval hero has long been a desideratum. Too much obscurity has been suffered to rest upon his name, and we are glad that it is about to be dispelled. By those who, like us, have listened in the nursery to the vague tales of his "ocean wanderings," replete with the spirit of romance and fierce daring, we fear that his character is not rightly estimated. Tradition is not scrupulous with regard to facts, and our conclusions from it may consequently be erroneous; but now that the action and the aim are to be set before the world from his own manuscripts, we are inclined to believe that not only ourselves, but posterity will assign him a high place among our revolutionary champions. The following, gathered from the prospectus of Mrs. Taylor, will explain more fully the object of the contemplated publication.

"The name of Paul Jones is associated with the earliest history of the American navy. He was the man who first unfurled the American flag on board a ship of war. His gallant conduct as a naval officer in the service of the United States, during the revolutionary struggle, has rendered his reputation and his fame the property of the American public. Of personal and professional reputation, no man was more jealous—and though guarded in both by the most honourable attestations of congress and of the king of France, as well as by the united public voice of continental Europe, and the United States, he had the fortune to be abundantly slandered while living; and his character and history seem to be imperfectly understood at the present day. A mutilated account of him was published a few years since in America, and more recently, some limited extracts have appeared from his manuscripts in England, connected by the remarks and comments of an English editor. The journals kept by Commodore Jones, from the time of entering the naval service of the United States to the close of the revolutionary war, and afterwards, during his services under Catharine II. of Russia, are full and interesting; at the same time his correspondence with congress, with the French ministry, and with many of the most distinguished men in the United States and in Europe, was extensive, and has been carefully preserved with his papers. Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Jay, Franklin, Morris, La Fayette, &c. were among his most intimate correspondents. His manuscripts not only exhibit in bold relief his own character, but develop much of the true history and spirit of the interesting times in which he lived. His near relatives feel it due to the people of the United States, as well as to the memory of one of their earliest and most distinguished naval heroes, to publish an authenticated memoir of his life. Paul Jones, from his first entrance into the American service, was denounced in England as a pirate, and it is to defend his memory against this, and other calumnies, that the publisher now visits the United States with all his journals and correspondence. It is not too much to say that the character of the man, and the eventful period in which he lived, cannot fail to give the volume interest. That it may have as much as circumstances will permit, all the materials are committed to the hands of a distinguished literary gentleman, who is pledged to prepare the work for the press as early as may be, consistent with a faithful execution of his task."

The work will be comprised in a single octavo volume of about five hundred pages.

Conjugal affection.—Among the numerous instances of the excess to which this celestial passion can be carried, that of the fair Arria's death is not the least conspicuous in ancient history. Her husband, Coecina Poetus, a man of consular dignity in Rome, and her son, a very amiable and promising youth, were both seized at the same time with a very dangerous disorder. The son died, but the affectionate mother and wife concealed the distressing event from her sick husband, the youth's father; and, whenever she appeared in his presence, assumed a cheerful countenance, and answered his inquiries respecting the deceased with so much composure and serenity, that she even prevented the suspicion of his death.

When her husband was apprehended, in consequence of having joined Scribonianus in a rebellion against the emperor Claudius, and was conveyed by sea to Rome, Arria wished to accompany him in the same vessel; but being refused, she hired a fishing-boat and followed him. Having arrived at Rome, she determined to die with Poetus; and to the remonstrance of her son-in-law, Thræsea, who asked her, "Would you wish that your daughter should accompany me, if I were to die?" she replied, "Yes, provided she had lived so long and so happy with you as I have lived with Poetus." To those who watched her, and who endeavoured to divert the execution of her purpose, she said, "You may make my death more painful, but cannot prevent it;" and dashing her head against the wall, fell senseless to the ground. Upon her recovery, she calmly said, "I told you that I would find a difficult road to death, if you hindered me from obtaining an easy one."

When Poetus was ordered to destroy himself, Arria, perceiving his hesitation, plunged a dagger in her breast and then presented it, covered with blood, to her husband, exclaiming, in words celebrated by the ancients, (who did not entertain that horror of suicide which christians have derived from better principles) "Poetus, it is not painful!"

Martial's epigram on this subject is well known, but it is remarkable that he has given an ingenious turn to the speech, which injures its noble simplicity:

Castæ suo gladium cum traderet Arria Poeto,
Quem de visceribus traxerat ipsa suis;
Si qua sides, vulnus, quod feci, non dolet, inquit,
Sed quod tu facies, hoc mihi, Poeta, dolet.

When Arria pulled the dagger from her side,
Thus to her consort spoke the illustrious bride:
"The wound I gave myself I do not grieve;
I die by that which Poetus must receive."

We know not whether this story has ever been dramatised, but we think it affords a subject for the stage.

Singular and plural.—We sincerely wish that some of our erudite correspondents would enlighten us a little on the following subject. It is doubtless well known that there are only seven nouns in the English language ending with aff; viz. gaff, graff, staff, distaff, tipstaff, whipstaff, and quarterstaff. Now all these, we believe, if analogy be consulted, ought to form their plurals alike, and their pronunciation ought to be the same. But none of the lexicographers which we have consulted, give any directions on the subject, except as regards the word staff, which, they say, becomes staves, (rhyming with waves) in the plural. But is it also proper to say, "every sloop and schooner ought to be provided with several extra gâres?" and if speaking of more than one graff, (a ditch or moat) must we call them grâves? and follow the same rule with respect to the words distaff, whipstaff, and tipstaff? Why not form the plural of each by simply adding an s? or if it be necessary to change the ff to v, why not pronounce the word so as to rhyme with halves and calves? There is such a noun as stave, belonging to a barrel, &c. Although Doctor Johnson might have been ignorant of the circumstance, Webster gives it, and the plural is undoubtedly staves. But these things are not walking-sticks! Why should not the plural of staff (a walking-stick) rhyme with gaffs, he quaffs, and he graffs, or he laughs? But if v be necessary in the plural, why should we not so pronounce it as to rhyme with calves and halves? We ask for information.

Enigma in our last.—We have received several solutions to the enigma in our last number, both in verse and prose, some of which are very good things; but as the shortest of them would occupy more room than we find it convenient to spare, we hope the reader will accept of the solution in one word—Constantinople.

To correspondents.—"An Inquirer" is informed that the productions of our correspondents F. and C. appear exclusively in the columns of this periodical. The gentlemen who have adopted these signatures are regular correspondents of the Mirror; and we are authorised to state, that they have not written, nor do they intend to write for any other American journal.

LOVE'S RITONELLA.

AS SUNG BY MR. SIMPSON, WITH UNBOUNDED APPLAUSE, IN THE POPULAR DRAMA OF THE BRIGAND—MUSIC BY T. COOKE.

ALLEGRETTO.

“Gen - tle Zi - tel - la, whi - ther a - way? Love's ri - to - nel - la, List while I play.” “No, I have lin - ger'd too long on my road, Night is ad - vanc - ing, the bri - gand's a - broad; Lone - ly Zi - tel - la hath too much to fear, Love's ri - to - nel - la she may not hear.”

3d—“Charming Zitella, why should'st thou care,
Night is not darker than thy raven hair,
And those bright eyes if the brigand should see

Thou art the robber, the captive is he;
Gentle Zitella, banish thy fear,
Love's ritonella tarry and hear.

3d—“Simple Zitella, beware, ah beware,
List ye no ditty, grant ye no prayer,
To your light footsteps let terror add wings,

’Tis Massaroni himself who now sings;
Gentle Zitella, banish thy fear,
Love's ritonella tarry and hear.”

VARIETIES.

COURT AND CAMP OF BONAPARTE.—The following are extracts from the “Court and Camp of Bonaparte,” which forms the eighth number of the “Family Library,” and consists of brief memoirs of Napoleon's wives, brothers, sisters, &c. Of Lucien it is said:

His style of living was most frugal; a circumstance that, considering his immense riches, occasions some surprise. A friend one day ventured to ask him the cause, and his answer is remarkable for its prophetic spirit: “How do you know that I may not ere long have four or five kings to support?”

“Jerome,” said Napoleon one day, “they say the majesty of kings is stamped on the brow! you may travel incognito to doomsday without being recognised!”

During a heavy cannonade, Bonaparte, having occasion to dictate a despatch, inquired if any one near him could write. Junot stepped out of the ranks, and while penning the despatch, a shot struck the ground close by his side, and covered both with dust. “This is fortunate, sir,” observed the grenadier, laughing, “I was in want of sand.” “You are a brave fellow,” said Bonaparte, “how can I serve you?” “Give me promotion, I will not disgrace it!” He was immediately made a sergeant.

Lefebvre had an estate at Combaut, in the department of the Seine-et-Marne. In an apartment of his mansion there was a chest, at least twenty feet long, the contents of which many visitors were anxious to see. One day the dutchess opened it, in the presence of a female friend: it was found to contain all the successive garments which she and her husband had worn since their marriage. The oldest were coarse plain habits; the more recent ones bore the insignia of ducal rank. “My husband and I,” said the lady, “have taken pleasure in preserving these garments; there is no harm in looking on them from time to time; people should not forget what their history has been.”

AN EXTRACT.—“Few things in this weary world are so delightful as keepsakes! Nor do they ever, to my heart at least, nor to my eye, lose their tender—their powerful charm! How slight, how small, how tiny a memorial, saves a beloved one from oblivion—worn on the finger, or close to the heart! especially if they be dead! No thought is so insupportable as that of entire, total, blank forgetfulness—when the creature that once laughed, and sang, and wept to us, close to our side, or in our very arms, is as if her smiles, her voice, her tears, her kisses had never been. She and them all swallowed up in the dark nothingness of the dust!

Of all keepsakes, memorials, relics,—most dearly, most devoutly do I love a little lock of hair!—and oh! when the head that beautified it has long mouldered in the dust, how spiritual seems the undying glossiness of the sole remaining ringlet! All else gone to nothing—save and except that soft, smooth, burnished and glorious fragment of the apprelling that once hung in clouds and sunshine over an angel's brow! Ay, a lock of hair is far better than any picture—it is a part of the beloved object herself: it belonged to the tresses that often, long—long ago, may have all been suddenly dishevelled, like a shower of sunbeams, over your beating breast! But now solemn thoughts sadden the beauty once so bright—so refulgent: the longer you gaze on it, the more and more pensive grows the expression of the holy relic—it seems to say, almost upbraidingly, ‘Weep'st thou no more for me? and then indeed, a tear, true to the imperishable affection in which all nature once seemed to rejoice, bears witness, that the object towards which it yearned is no more forgotten, now that she has been dead for so many, many long, weary days, months, years—than she was forgotten during one hour of absence, that came like a passing cloud between us and the sunshine of her living—her loving smiles!’

JOHN BULL'S GULLIBILITY.—The most extraordinary instance perhaps on record of the gullibility of Londoners, is to be found in the story of the bottle conjuror. A fellow gave out that he would creep into a quart bottle. The feat was to be performed on a public theatre, without trick or slight, in an honest bona fide way. It might have been supposed that the extravagance of the absurdity would create a laugh; but in what country under heaven could such a proposal have been taken in earnest? Long before the hour of the curtain's rising the house was crammed to suffocation. At length the hoaxer made his appearance. Every eye was opened, every mouth was shut. “Ladies and gentlemen,” said the wag, “I have searched all the taverns in London for a quart bottle, but to no purpose; however, to console you for your disappointment, if you'll come back to-morrow night, I'll go into a pint bottle.” The fellow, of course, bolted immediately on finishing his address; and the audience, instead of laughing at themselves and one another, actually destroyed the whole of the interior of the theatre, because a man, about five feet ten in his stockings, had promised them that he would creep into a quart bottle, and had not kept his word!

PAGANINI THE MUSICIAN.—At a table d'hôte in Germany, the conversation happened lately to turn on the subject of Paganini's musical skill. An individual who was present laid a wager that at a concert to be given that very evening, the celebrated performer would be completely nonplussed by the substitution of another instrument in place of that on which he usually played. The wager being accepted, the better contrived to exchange Paganini's violin for a cracked fiddle. Just as the concert was about to commence, the musician discovered the trick, and without losing his self-possession, he thus addressed his audience:—“Ladies and gentlemen, I perceive that my violin has been changed for another; the art, however, is not in the wood, but in me!” He then commenced playing, and drew forth from the wretched instrument the most ravishing sounds that had ever delighted the ears of his audience. The bet was lost; but the better had disappeared, and with him Paganini's violin.

BARRY THE PAINTER.—A young lady from the north, of great beauty and wit, went to take a look at Barry's painting of elysium. She looked earnestly for a while, and said to Mr. Barry, “The ladies have not yet arrived in this paradise of yours.” “O, but they have, madam,” said the painter with a smile; “they reached elysium some time ago; but I could find no place so fit for creatures so bright and beautiful as behind yon very luminous cloud—they are there, and very happy, I assure you.”

LAMP GLASSES.—A very simple but effective precaution is employed in Paris, to prevent the breaking of lamp glasses by the sudden application of heat. Before they are used, a glazier cuts or scratches the base of the glass with a diamond, and afterwards sudden heat may be applied without danger.

PERCUSSION GUNS.—An experiment is to be very shortly tried at Woolwich, to fire ship guns by percussion.

MARRIAGE TABLE.—Mr. Finkelson has made out a table, and published it in the London papers, showing to a very fraction what a woman's chances of marriage are for every year of her life. Of one thousand married women, taken without selection, it is found that the number married at each age is as below:

Age.	Chances.	Age.	Chances.	Age.	Chances.
14 to 15.....	32	24 to 25.....	102	34 to 35.....	8
16 to 17.....	101	26 to 27.....	60	36 to 37.....	2
18 to 19.....	219	28 to 29.....	45	38 to 39.....	1
20 to 21.....	233	30 to 31.....	18
22 to 23.....	165	32 to 33.....	14		1000

GEORGE P. MORRIS, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

Published every Saturday, at 163 William-street, between Beekman and Ann streets.—Terms four dollars per annum, payable in advance.—No subscription received for a less period than one year.

J. SEYMOUR, PRINTER, JOHN-STREET.

NEW-YORK MIRROR,

AND LADIES' LITERARY GAZETTE.

VOLUME VII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 10, 1830.

NUMBER 40.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

LINES,

Written after reading Miss Brager's Anne Boleyn.

Sure sat within that dismal tower, and leaning on her hand,
Watched the departing sun go down, and gazed o'er that fair land;
Like it, she too was beautiful, and in her spring's soft bloom,
To-morrow, and that setting sun must look upon her tomb!

Oh, dreadful is the thought of death! the ceasing of our life!
How with our every feeling it's eternally at strife!
Yet was she calm, to outward show, and, musing o'er her fate,
Recalled once more to memory her former high estate.

She thought how long, how ardently the king for her had strove;
With what impassioned words and looks he tried to win her love;
How oft escaped from regal pomp, all joyfully he flew Towards her father's peaceful halls, to seek her and to woo!

She thought too of her plighted troth, to brave Northumberland,
And how their mutual vow was riven by Henry's stern command;
Perchance affection's latent spark still lingered in her heart!
For it had cost her many a pang with Percy's love to part!

The youthful Percy! what a host of pleasure and of woes
With that well-remembered name upon her mind arose;
The sweet exchange of tender words, the walk, the smile, the kiss,
And those the hush awakening from that bright dream of bliss!

And memory brought again to view that noble, gorgeous scene,
In which conspicuously she shone a beauty and a queen!
Ay, in this very tower she sat, but three short years before,
While a whole nation round her came to gaze, and to adore!

The change, the change—alone, condemn'd, to-morrow she must bleed,
Imperious in his love and will, the king hath thus decreed;
Another maiden young and fair has charmed her husband's eye—
Jane Seymour must become his bride, and Ann Boleyn must die!

But oh! with crime's most horrid stamp, to sully her high fame,
And give to her, the noble! prond! a vile and guilty name!
She almost sank—but she had vowed to bear unto the end;
And tho' her strength had well nigh fail'd, her features did not bend!

But softer feelings now came o'er that tried and conquering breast—
Her parents in their tenderness—now with dark wo oppress!
Could she behold them yet once more!—but, no! it must not be—
The king has willed—a kindred face she ne'er again shall see!

And then, her child no more to clasp!—her fixed resolve is broke!
And in that groan so fearful, deep, a mother's anguish spoke!
The mad'ning thought at once has roused—in piercing accents wild,
With streaming eyes and tortured soul, she cries, my child! my child!

'Tis past! no more shall grief assail that pure and noble heart;
In earthly feelings, from this time, she has no lot or part!
To God she turns, a refuge sure, from fears, or grief, or hate,
And calmly waits the coming morn, to yield her to her fate! ISABEL.

STANZAS.*

The sun had sunk in darkness to his sleep
Mid shadowy forests towards the distant west,
And not a star had lit its taper beams,
To watch the day-god's cloud-encircled couch;
While still the moon, forgetful of her task
To reign in beauty o'er the shrouded world,
Dreamily slumbered with her Letman love.
The winds had died amid the sultry air,
Eurus, and zephyr, and the sweet south-west,
All fainting died beneath the summer's glow;
And all around that forest-cinctured vale,
The drooping leaves hung dewless from their boughs,
Like train-band banners at an August noon,
Or silent fell into the pebbly bed
Of vanished streams that murmured now no more.
The woodland minstrels waved their wings for breath,
Then fluttering gasped and toppled from their perch;
And cattle panted in the withered fields,
With sides that like a stithy's bellows played;
While men lay tossing on their restless couch,
Bedrenched with dews of perspiration vast,
Dreaming of torrid temperatures, perchance,
Or Etna's flames, or stygian Phlegethon.
Dead silence awed the world, save now and then
A groan of smothered thunder died away,
Amid the blackness of the sulphurous gloom,
That shrouded midnight in its murky folds.
But now within that sleeping vale arose,
Upon the stifled air, a rattling din,
A rude and stunning olio of sound,
Harsh as a host of braziers ever rung
Upon an empty caldron's groaning sides.
It seemed as screaming discord had broke loose
With all her scannell goblins at her heels,
To serenade that haggard hag, the night,
With mingled bruit of gong and rebec crack'd,
And gibbering note of unproportioned tongues.
Onward it rolled—that pandemonian sound—

* Tradition says that some fifty years since, during an August night of a very hot summer, the frogs of a "dried-up" pond in the vicinity of a hamlet in Connecticut, migrated en masse for a "better shore"—a thing, by the way, not particularly uncommon among the bipeds of that goodly commonwealth—and that the din which attended this evocational movement, falling at midnight

"On many a conscious ill at ease, Brought its scared victim to his knees," under the impression that the last trumpet was actually sounding.

If sound it might be called that passed all note
Of sound erst heard beneath the babbling spheres;
Till Echo, frightened in her hollow cell,
Shrieking expired at her own mimic cries.
Minim or quaver, breve or semibreve,
Minor, or alt, or octave, had it none;
Or rather all it had, all notes and times,
And tones, save naturale, flats, sharps, shakes, swells,
Lentos, and prestos, and fortissimos—
All touched at once upon a different key,
Untimed, untuned, and unconcerted all.
Still on it rolled, whilst from the startled roost
The poaching owl swept booming with affright,
To his dark cloister in the time-worn oak;
The fox stole trembling to his hidden hole;
And e'en the house-dog at his master's door,
A stern and faithful sentinel, dared not growl.
Men shuddering broke from sleep at that wild cry,
Deeming the day of reckoning was at hand,
And making genuflections low, with tears,
Whispered quick prayers between their blanched lips.
But morning came anon, and finding now
That death had not presented his subpoena,
They ventured forth, with cautious steps and slow,
To learn the wherefore of the dire alarm;
When lo! within the hamlet's bordering fields,
Ten thousand times ten thousand husky frogs,
Whom tipping Sol had drank from house and home,
Marshaled in thick array, hopped croaking on,
With visage sad, and dolorous lament,
To seek a better, more congenial clime,
In some dank marsh, or pool, or coolly pond,
Where summer's heat should parch their pipes no more,
Nor burn to bronze their sky-set brows sublime.

PROTEUS.

THE DUELLIST.

Ask of the wasting heart that lies
Beneath the pressure of the sod;
Ask of the soul, that through the skies
Rushed, unannounced, up to God!
Ask these—of honour's boasted fame,
The blended bay and cypress wreath;
What is the glory of their name
When withering on the brow of death!

Ask of the mourners, gathering round
The gory victim's place of rest;
In grief's all-shadowy durance bound,
While labouring anguish thrills the breast;
Ask ye of them, what balm can pour
Its soothing influence midst the throng,
Whose earthly hopes can bloom no more,
As sweeps life's sullen tide along!

But yesterday! and on the brow
Of a familiar friend there played
The smile of feeling's ardent glow,
Untouched by sadness or by shade:
His heart beat lightly in the spell
Of opening manhood's reckless glee;
He sought the field—"and fighting, fell,"—
Death claimed his own—and where is he?

Late have I seen him in the hall
Where pleasure's orgies all were kept;
Where shone youth's flowery coronal,
Where cares were hushed, and sorrows slept:
With friends around him in the dance,
And sisters in the glow of youth,
Rich in young life's inheritance,
And stirred by dreams he fancied truth!

But passion which he roused not, came
To dim the glory of his eye;
And for the phantom of a name,
False honour's field he sought—to die!
With kind affections in his breast,
That cowered beneath uprising pride,
He sunk, untimely, to his rest;
Loved and lamented—thus he died!

And friendship hath no voice to call
Back to her arms that faded one;
He sleeps in death's low silent hall,
In dust—in darkness—and alone!
But the soul's fate that passed away
Through the void ether—who may tell?
'Tis mystery all—a clouded ray—
Thou lost and loved—farewell—farewell!

Philadelphia, April, 1830.

W. G. O.

TIME.

'Twixt promised joys the wheel of time moves slow,
The hour-glass' ebbing sands scarce seem to flow;
But ah! when once attained, how swiftly steal
The bright sands onward, and revolves the wheel!

POPULAR TALES.

CONFESSIONS OF A SUSPICIOUS GENTLEMAN.

BY LORD NUGENT.

IN TWO CHAPTERS—CHAPTER THE SECOND.

In this state of mind, having determined to make myself utterly miserable, I had not rightly determined how to set about it, when I obtained the assistance of a neighbouring lady. She wrought not her mischief in the ordinary vocation of her sex—she was not a coquette; nor was she of an age to do any mischief at first sight. She was not malicious, like some, nor jealous like most. But yet she was one of a tolerably large class of mischievous persons. She was one of those who, from the most amiable desire to be agreeable and useful in the world, make all people's affairs their own; who delight in getting hold of a story, and usually get hold of it by its wrong in preference to its right end; then benevolently impart their hold of this wrong end to the very person whose happiness is the most likely to be involved in the distinction between the right and the wrong, and have accordingly often to lament the becoming the "innocent cause" of some sad piece of work. She was a gossip; this was her only folly—a great one. My much greater was the eagerly accepting from her that fruit of knowledge which it was the first vice of greedy man to devour upon the offer of communicative woman.

I would not that he who loves his wealth should gamble with sharpers, nor that he who values his life should drink with braves. But with a far deeper dread let the suspicious man censure all converse with a well-meaning gossip!

This lady, from a desire to set me on yet better terms with my wife, was kind enough to hint that Lady Anne had, for my sake, refused an alliance with a younger and a richer man than myself. The name only, from motives of delicacy, she postponed. And thus, though her love of imparting all was quite as strong as mine of hearing all she could impart, was I kept feeding, unsatisfied still, and my hunger increasing, on the stimulating food of vague and incomplete information. At length, after extorting the strictest promises of secrecy, she confessed that my unsuccessful rival was Sir Felix ———. That he had proposed soon after I had been accepted; that he had been rejected, but not with severity; that, on the contrary, as Lady Anne considered his proposal a strictly honourable one, she had allowed him afterwards to write to her; that she had, in her turn, behaved with a most commendable discretion, for that, to prevent any unpleasant feeling between us, she always retired from company to read his letters; that the difficulty which, up to the last moment, she had to struggle with from his importunities was shown by her having, early on the very morning of her marriage, given him a letter, which he kissed, and not only it but the hand which gave it; and that she was not insensible to the pain it had been her duty to inflict, for she at the same time wiped a tear from her eye with the very handkerchief which, an hour after, performed the same office at the altar. "I do not repeat a word that I cannot swear to," said my kind informant, "all these particulars I had from my own maid, who is cousin to Sir Felix's groom's wife, who lives in Sir Felix's own house." Horror, upon horror! I gave full belief to a gossip, a groom, and a groom's wife, and her cousin who was the gossip's own maid; and then entered judgment on the whole, first against the affection, and then against the honour, of my wife!

To bring to open proof what is unproveable, because untrue, is a very desperate undertaking, though in the affairs of life a very ordinary one; and, in the eagerness of this pursuit, I quite forgot that my success would be my shame. But, though I failed of the proof, I ensured the dishonour. I assumed different disguises in which I daily watched Lady Anne. I wrote her anonymous letters, in the style in which I fancied Sir Felix might address her. I hid myself to observe the effect they would produce. I have seen her countenance mark surprise and anger, as she committed them, half perused, to the flames. I have seen her weep, when, as she believed, she was alone; and still I deemed that her tears were faithless to my honour and her own, and that, if amid those tears she thought of me, it was only that she wept over my vigilance which deprived her of the society of her lover. Do not detest me, reader, more than is my due. I felt my own baseness to the quick. My conscience told me I deserved her hate, and assured me that I had obtained it. Yet I went on. Our home was no happy one; and she never dissembled her readiness to meet my proposal to her to live more in the crowd and bustle of the world. This proposal of mine was in the hope of throwing her into habits of unguardedness; her quick concurrence in it I attributed to the hope, in her, of more frequent occasions of meeting Sir Felix. I saw them meet, with demonstrations of a pleasure which they never strove to hide. Often would she quit my arm for his, and sometimes (I still think) an indifferent person might have traced in their manner the appearance of something like an intelligence between them to which I was not a party. I ask not for sympathy; but still if there be a state of human suffering singly more exquisite than all the rest in which unhappy man may writhe, it is when a jealous heart sees the object of its pride occupied in ministering to the affections or vanities of another. I have said I was incapable of love. I sometimes doubt it. I know that I have been the prey of jealousy; and whether the one can exist without the other, I leave to such metaphysicians as may think that question a profitable one to discuss.

I was subject to nervous attacks. One evening I was particularly indisposed; I complained of feverishness and thirst. Lady Anne had promised to spend an hour or two from home with a sick friend; but she wished to excuse herself and stay with me. I peevishly refused to permit her to defer the engagement. I thought her concern for me affected, and it disgusted and angered me. At length, when by my command she left me, she placed on the table by my elbow a jug of lemonade. Shortly after her departure I took a large draught of it—my thirst and restlessness increasing, I returned to my jug. I was seized with giddiness. Oh, was it possible!—Yes! Such things have been! The horrid thought struck me, that aversion and revenge had done their work—that I was poisoned—and by my own wife! I rang the bell violently, communicated to all my servants the strong probability of their mistress being an assassin, and sent off three of them instantly in different directions: one for a police-officer, one for a doctor, and one for a stomach-pump.

Lady Anne returned in the midst of the scene that ensued, having shortened her visit to attend on me. The stomach-pump had just done its work, in its own rough and summary way, and the doctor was, by my particular desire, engaged in an active chemical analysis of the proceeds. I was sitting in great anxiety to hear by what preparation of vegetable or mineral mischief my life had been attempted. No trace of poison could the doctor find in what had been made to rise in judgment; and now did he endeavour to calm me into admitting the persuasion that is was only the excitement of the mind acting upon those sensitive sympathizers in all the mental distresses of man, the biliary organs. Pooh! And was it thus I was to be defrauded of my hopes of proving myself a murdered man? I had never, for a moment, lost sight of the vessel that contained the residue of the lemonade. I now desired the doctor to transfer his attention to the jug, and promised him a deposit of arsenic at the bottom. My wife had hitherto sat, not an unmoved but a resolute and indignant spectator of all this strange performance. At this moment she seized, with a strong and sudden effort, the jug which was already in the doctor's hands. I thought she would dash it to the ground, and shrieked out to all to rescue it from her grasp; but she had swallowed every drop that remained! She quietly and silently resumed her seat! What could I think? One moment conscience told me I had wronged her, and immortalized the proofs of my madness before competent witnesses; but at the next, I concluded that the certainty of detection and punishment had impelled her to the horrible resolution of adding suicide to an attempt at murder. Surprise, anxiety, and the exhaustion of the mechanical process my stomach had undergone, had made me incapable of exertion. My situation was deplorable. The doctor departed, shrugging his shoulders; my servants with difficulty smothered their laughter; and my wife sat bolt upright, and neither sickened nor swooned. A fearful languor stole over my senses; I thought I was dying. I remember no more. It seems a deep sleep came over me, and I was carried to bed.

Late next day I awoke to a full sense of all that had passed, together with a confounding consciousness of perfect health. I intended to sneak out of the house unobserved, but, on my opening my door, I was presented with a letter. It was from Lady Anne. In a tone of remonstrance so dignified and so deserved, that it left me without a word or thought in my defence, she told me that we must part—not for her character's sake only, but for my own repose. She left the choice of the place of her retirement to me. She said she had quitted my house as soon as the disgraceful scene of the former night had closed, and had gone to that of her sick friend, where she should remain until I should have determined on her future plans, but declared that nothing could induce her ever again to see a husband who had so cruelly repaid her blameless conduct. She ended with an earnest, an affectionate prayer to me to strive, for my own happiness and credit, to conquer my most unhappy fault, which had led to such an insult as alone could have driven her from my side.

I was abashed. But, before I could believe her thoroughly in the right, I resolved to have one more peep. I shall surprise the reader when I say that now I really saw the eternal Sir Felix go stealthily to the house of Lady Anne's sick friend. I saw him let in and out with every sign of caution. He used to go there unattended, and generally at twilight, wrapped in one of those hideous cloaks which have lately been introduced into fashion, with many other filthy serenading habits from foreign parts. Was I now justified in fearing that all was not quite right? I felt certain that all was quite wrong; and I only waited for the chance of such a disclosure as might effectually rid me of the shackles and dangers of the marriage bond. These hopes were delayed by the departure of Lady Anne from London. She had, through her lawyer, repeatedly urged me to choose a residence for her; but, in furtherance of my project, I had left these applications without a reply. I thought I had every reason to resent the step she had now taken. In my phrenzy I protested against her having moved without my knowledge and permission. But, where was Sir Felix? He had gone abroad. Now all was clear to me. While he was in London, Lady Anne had been content to remain with her friend; and it was upon his quitting England (tired no doubt of her and of her affection) that she had taken the sudden resolution of leaving a town which had ceased to contain her lover, and that did contain her husband. She was now where, unmolested, she could mourn over his absence and his inconstancy!

For myself, I was again alone in the world; my years, my infirmities increasing. I began too to perceive, with a sensitiveness which a disposition like mine was calculated to sharpen, that the world, after having at first made some show in my favour, had now withdrawn its sympathy; and that many a tale of my forepast follies was rising again in judgment, much to my disparagement in my present condition. I had no immediate hopes of the success of my favourite scheme; for month after month elapsed, and it appeared as though Sir Felix had resolved to return no more. To shake, if possible, this resolution of his, now so fatal to my hopes, and to deceive Lady Anne into a false security, I feigned preparations for going abroad, and put my departure in the papers. But I quitted not London; I changed my way of life, and taking lodgings in the healthy and retired neighbourhood of the Edgeware road, I there concealed myself under a feigned name, and the assumed character of a bachelor. My landlady, who represented herself as an officer's widow, a conversable and comely body, soon became to me a woman after my own heart. She would make my tea, and render my evenings agreeable with stories of her departed husband. She confessed over our cups that she had not lived happily with him, and she assured me of her determination never again to marry. She was the first single woman I had ever known who I was quite sure had no designs, however remote, upon my person. For she thought me poor. I used, for several days together, to leave my lodgings, without any account of my actions being given or required. Thus I had at last discovered a manner of woman and of life which suited me. In one of my old disguises I used to prow about the neighbourhood of the cottage that contained my unhappy wife. I used, unobserved, to see her frequently. Ever alone—ever melancholy—and sinking under a decay of health and beauty which I am willing to hope might have awakened tenderness even in me, had I not attributed it, wretch as I was, to any but the innocent and virtuous grief that was consuming her.

Yet this life was idle and uneventful; and an idle and uneventful life leaves a man's head and heart open to strange fancies. It left me, now, in my age, and for the first time, to fancy myself in love. Can the reader doubt with whom? If he does, he has never lived in single gentleman's lodgings, with a comely communicative landlady, who makes his tea, who flatters his vanity by confiding to him her causes of discontent with her departed husband, and lulls his suspicions by imparting her determination to marry no more. I laid the whole plan of the drama; Lady Anne's part of the performance I considered nearly as good as settled. I should obtain my divorce. My widow would be kind when assisted by the charms of my strong box, (les beaux yeux de ma cassette), I should open it and my heart to her together. Fortune too seemed at length to favour the completion of my design, for I read in the papers of Sir Felix's return.

I had but one doubt which hung behind to perplex me. Would my widow, would any woman, be tender and true enough to cleave to me still, when, by accident or illness, as I should decline in years, I might become incapable of acting profitably for myself? Judging by her tenderness to a sickly, stupid, abusive, superannuated parrot, whom she cherished, she was capable, I thought, of constant disinterested love. But I determined on a trial. I resolved to sham illness, and to watch her use of the brief authority with which I should thus be able to invest her. The very next night I rang her up from her bed. My usual spare and anxious countenance, aided in its lamentable expression by a night-cap, well arranged to assist the deception, and by a beard which had been purposely neglected, was not at variance with my story. She proposed a doctor. No, said I, doctors were expensive, and I was an old man, and might, I hoped, be allowed to die in peace, my own way. She exerted her own small knowledge of medicine in my behalf. I took all she gave me, the better to colour my design. I acted the part of a sick man not to the life only—I proceeded to act it to the death. Her behaviour had been charming, for several days—all attention, all kindness—and I now only wished to satisfy myself if she would show a little, a very little, sorrow, at the advances of my dissolution. I was just proceeding prosperously to the last scene, when she went out for an instant, as she said, to speak with a person on business. She had left the door a jar between the rooms, and I could distinctly hear her as she discoursed with a gruff-voiced man, to the following effect:

Man—Well mistress, is the old gentleman ready?

Landlady—Not quite, Jem; you must come back in the evening.

Man—That's impossible. I have to go beyond White-chapel for an old lady who must be pretty well dead by this time; and I have got a sack that will hold 'em both. And I'd words with my employer about the last bargain not being as fresh as might be, so that I shouldn't object if the old gentleman did stir a little in the sack after I get him to Mr. Mangless's house.

Landlady—Well, I don't know—he is all but gone—and it's dangerous to keep such things long in an honest lodging, now the cry is up about them. Remember, I must have half what's given. If you should do me out of a penny, I'll split—so, come, give us the sack!

To spring out from my death-bed on the floor, with a yell of "murder!" to fling the door to, and bolt it on the inside, was the affair of a moment, rendered short, vigorous, and decisive, by despair. Chairs, tables, every article of the furniture of a sick room, did I pile up in miraculous haste to form a barrier sufficient to keep the demons who were on the outside in check, while I might by my cries from the window invite the neighbourhood and passengers to witness my danger and defend my life; but superfluous were these precautions. With a clatter louder than that which I occasioned by throwing up my fortifications within, and with a yell, which for a moment deafened me to my own cry of "murder," did the wretches tumble over each other all the way down stairs. Then out of the street door they rushed together, and, turning the corner, disappeared. My head already half out of the window, I paused to reflect upon my condition. If I should alarm the neighbourhood, my landlady would doubtless retaliate upon me my accusation with a counter-charge of insanity. And too many things would concur to give colour to such an imputation; even, perhaps, to the placing me in a mad-house for life. I therefore thought my wisest course to be the one which I adopted in perfect silence. I dressed, and having merely armed myself with a poker against the possibility of my assailants returning in force before I should be able to descend the stairs, and leaving without reluctance behind me every part of that small stock of property which I had with me in my lodgings, I made my escape, bidding a hasty and a last farewell to the house which had no nearly witnessed the closing scene to my unhappy life. Often since have I shuddered as I passed that house, though now inhabited by very respectable and honest people. The demon in widow's shape I never since set eyes on, nor do I ever wish it.

The rest of my story is shortly told. This paragraph appeared in the papers:

"The gallant Sir Felix —, who is just returned from the continent, has announced his marriage with the accomplished Miss D—, which took place two years ago, under circumstances which made it necessary that it should not sooner be publicly declared."

When I say that Miss D— was the earliest of Lady

Anne's friends, the mystery of all that poisoned happiness of my married life is solved. In obedience to the gossip's stipulation, I had never had the frankness to ask my wife concerning her position with Sir Felix. It was on her friend's account alone she had ever communicated with him. Before her marriage, she had been trusted by them, and had suffered their letters to pass through her hands; and, on the morning of her marriage, she had formally resigned that trust. When she claimed an asylum in the house of her friend, that friend had already for some time been Sir Felix's wife.

There is one concluding part of my narrative which my readers will not have expected. Lady Anne is reconciled to me; but, as the condition, the only one, of her forgiveness, she has insisted on my committing my memorials to paper, as holding up to me a beacon to warn me hereafter from those dangers on which so often in former times the whole freight of my happiness was made wreck. Now that I have completed my task, it is against her wish that I publish it. But here she must be disobeyed. If it be the record of my own disgrace, it is no less that of her many virtues. As such it shall go forth into the world. There is one more act of justice which alas I cannot perform: it is to confess to my poor brother that the maxim of his simplicity was as wise as it was amiable. This though his death has prevented I have adopted his maxim with his children, and, together with them, make it my own; and thus, as it were, I inscribe it to his memory, as the moral of my tale. "On the whole, a greater share of happiness belongs to one, who, from thinking a little too well of the world, is sometimes deceived, than to one, who, from thinking a great deal too ill of the world, has through life to eat the bread of carefulness, seasoned with the bitter experience that, in a pitched battle between a sly man and sly mankind, the odds are awfully against the contentious unit."

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

WALL-STREET, BETWEEN ONE AND THREE O'CLOCK.

WALL-STREET!—What a host of associations arise to the man of business at the bare mention of this famed mart for bankers, brokers, insurance officers, and stock-jobbers! Turn with me, gentle reader, from the fashion and glare of Broadway, and forget for the moment its graphic and vivid description by the talented and witty C. lately inserted in this paper. Let us stroll leisurely down this business, stirring street, and endeavour to analyze a few of the causes and effects which produce the general excitation and confusion in this emporium of our city's wealth. The hurry and bustle is now at its fullest height: observe the anxious faces, passing and re-passing in quick succession, and we shall find ample scope for our speculations in this heterogeneous mass of disorder and confusion. Pause a moment before this building. Here is the receipt of customs, the yearly revenue of which furnishes a proud testimonial of the rapid improvement of this first of commercial cities. Observe the hurried egress and regress of the many anxious applicants. Two or three of those splendid packets, which claim the admiration of travellers to our continent, have arrived this morning, and the passengers are all eagerly engaged in the necessary forms for obtaining their luggage. Mark those two separate groups near the main entrance of the building, they are chiefly foreigners, as you may easily perceive by their dress and general appearance. Yonder sturdy looking fellow, with nether garments of drab, and leggings of the same material, is doubtless an Englishman, probably from one of the inland counties, who has never before wandered further than the market town adjacent to his native village; see what an anxious and wonder-struck gaze he casts on all around. A small portion of suspicion is also visible on his countenance. He has heard that brother Jonathan is a "tarnation cute chap," and sundry doubts are annoying him at the delay experienced by permits, entries, &c. which are increased by his total ignorance of all those tedious but necessary formulas; he is at length compelled to engage the services of that little shrewd looking fellow in spectacles, yclept a custom-house broker. They have agreed upon terms, and the sapient islander jogs closely after this "man of business," to see that all is fair.

Yonder is another specimen of English importations, but no more like his fellow-countryman, who just quitted the door, than a monkey is like an elephant; mark the high aristocratic bearing he is assuming; it sits rather uneasy upon him. Observe the exquisite finish of his tout ensemble; rather overdone, perhaps; some titled sprig of fashion, probably? Oh no, 'tis only the junior partner of a London house. This is his first trip to America; his head is divided between the ideal superiority of his own pretensions, and the numerous details he has perused and heard of the "western world." He is at the custom-house for the same purpose as the honest yeoman we saw; but you observe he is attended by a clerk of one of the agents to the packets, to whom he is giving the necessary information, with all the nonchalance of one of our own good society men, and occasionally raising his gold-encircled eye-glass, to mark some peculiarity in "the natives," for future notice in his common-place book, which, on his return to his native soil, is laudably intended to expand into two handsome octavos, illustrative of American habits and manners. That close groupe on the right, you will perceive, is composed of Frenchmen; they have been fellow-passengers, and consequently, with all the light-heartedness of their nation, they are now friends. Hark, how they rattle away; every thing is new to them; and it follows, of course, that every thing is "charmant," "superbe," "magnifique." A few sacres may be expended on the tediousness of custom-house forms; but the excitement produced by a release from the confines of shipboard throws a couleur de rose over every thing they are brought into contact with.

But we must pass on. Ah! stand aside, my good sir, or one of these numerous "accommodations," or "sociables," will falsify their titles at your expense, and you may have to regret the establishment of these "leather conveniences" for the up-town part of our population.

Now, then, we are fairly in the heart of the banks, insurance companies, and brokers' offices; observe the increased marks of calculation and care on every countenance; each man's mind seems occupied; very few listless or abstracted faces now meet the eye; all are intent on the one purpose, gain! See how the crowds pass in hasty succession in and from the entrances of the principal monied establishments; a different aspect may be traced on all. At yonder bank it is discount day; by the elongated visages of several who are descending the steps you may judge they have been unsuccessful in their applications. See that well-dressed young man, who is closing his bank-book so hastily, and arranging the papers it contains with a jerk, expressive of irritation; we may infer that he has determined to close his account with the bank; they have hurt his dignity, perhaps, by refusing what he terms "excellent paper." Another is now descending; a smile of complacency is visible in every feature; all he required has been done to-day; his friend the director, or the president, probably, has kept his word, and the bank, with the whole board of management, are all in his estimation a perfect concentration of excellence and liberality. At this bank on the left they have been paying their dividends to-day; only the common rate of interest; yet even that is pleasant, now-a-days, and you may observe its effect on the numerous individuals who are constantly leaving it, arranging their pocket-books and purses. On the opposite side of the way, that insurance-office is distributing its usually enormous dividends; look with what conscious importance some of its head officers are entering; they feel the weight of their semi-annual dividend of fifteen and sixteen per cent, and you may readily distinguish the fortunate stockholders, as they pass in and out, by the chuckle and the smile, which bespeak their "measureless content."

This noble building well claims our next attention. Here is the mart "where merchants most do congregate." Eclipsed are thy ancient glories, venerable Tontine; both building and frequenters are so unlike the former exchange and its plain occupants, that could the worthy mynheers of a century past, or the formal merchants and traders of some fifty years since, return and witness thy present appearance, they would indeed lift up their eyes in unfeigned wonder at the march of modern improvements and the progress of taste. Look at the numerous elegantes who crowd the steps, with what a tooth-pick indifference they lounge about this receptacle for business; these are engrossed in trade only by compulsion. The heart is occupied with what to them is of infinitely more importance, fashion and frivolity! The hour for the daily promenade in Broadway approaches, and they are moving off to their diurnal duty, pleased to escape the dull routine of dockets, invoices, and bills of lading. But a far more numerous and solid class is left behind. Observe the purse-proud importance of some of these magnets in the commercial world, how leisurely they make their way to the great theatre of their operations, calculation stamped on every wrinkle in their visages; the lips compressed to exclude any converse but what treats of cotton, indigo, and the numerous et ceteras of commercial speculation. While some there are, who, dignifying the character of a merchant, evince in every lineament the upright and generous feelings which their extensive avocations and wide-spreading influence are calculated to produce. Descend with me into these Tartarean regions, for by the hurrying to and fro of the foot passengers I perceive a mail has arrived. Here is disseminated daily, news from every quarter of the globe, to the thousands of eager recipients of its well-regulated dispensatory favours. Hark, how the crowds of its clerks and principals of our head houses, are vociferating the number of their separate boxes. Observe the varying features of some who have opened their paper messengers of good or ill, differently agitated, as these eloquent but silent missives announce welcome or unpleasant intelligence. That gentlemanly man with spectacles, yonder, has doubtless received news of the success of some valuable consignment, or Prompt, Punctual & Co. have duly honoured his drafts; while you may easily perceive that the fashionable young man to the right is not equally satisfied with his communication; some expected remittance has failed in coming on, or perhaps old square-toes refuses further aid for his elegant extravagances, or the house of Fail, Totter & Co. has stopped payment, or any one of the numerous difficulties and disappointments in mercantile speculation may have occurred, and the anxiously expected letter is only the source of added anxiety.

Let us leave these variously excited groups, and pass again into the open street; do you not observe an increased commotion among the passing throng? It draws near the talismanic hour of three! Mark what a hurry and confusion is apparent among the thousand and one brokers' offices—see how the clerks are crossing from one to the other of them—checks are passing and re-passing with inconceivable rapidity—"kites are flying" in all quarters—watches are now in great request—accounts are closing at all the banks—and balances are making up at all the brokers—a few pale and anxious countenances are rapidly emerging from some of the numerous "shaving shops," and are quickly lost in one or other of the banking establishments, just in the nick of time to save a protest and bolster up their already tottering credit. The clock strikes three! Already the "men machines" from the custom-house and the host of insurance-offices, are issuing from their desks, spruce and alert, snuffing once more the "caller air," and taking their seats in the "accommodations," or eagerly making their way on foot to their separate homes. The crowds are gradually dispersing—a solitary idler or so, alone paces the lately busy street, and in a short time it will look as deserted and as gloomy, as though it had recently been visited by the yellow-fever.

D.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

PATENT CRADLE.

In our remarks in a former number, says the Medical Inquirer, addressed to mothers and nurses, we expressed our detestation of cradles, thereby meaning our common rocking and swing cradles. We then conceived of no substitute that would be free of the objections we entertained, and we therefore considered the bed, or a standing crib, as the most proper resting place for a child. Since writing that article we have seen a cradle, or crib, on a new construction, invented by and patented to Mr. J. M. Read, a clerk in our post-office department. Every thing objectionable in the common cradles is removed by Mr. Read's plan; and whilst motion is desirable to contribute to rest or to health, that purpose is amply effected by the patent cradle.

Mr. Read has exhibited his model, or a miniature cradle, to several of our old and experienced practitioners of medicine, whose approbation was manifested by their prompt and cheerful recommendation of its superiority over every other cradle, and by some of them giving immediate orders for substituting them for those in present use in their own families.

We shall endeavour to give an idea of the form and motion of Mr. Read's cradle. When at rest, it has the appearance of the common crib with fixed bottom, and is supported by four pillars, on moveable joints. A small pedestal is attached below, on which the slightest pressure of the foot gives a forward and backward motion to the body, imitating the motion of a carriage, on nearly a horizontal line. There is also a second moving power attached by passing a cord from the bottom over a small brass pulley, to the end of which cord a plaything may be tied, and put into the child's hands. The act of handling its plaything will set the cradle in motion, and thus enable the child to rock itself. For this useful invention, Mr. Read not only deserves, what he must necessarily obtain, the public patronage for his ingenious contrivance, but also the gratitude of every parent who can appreciate the bad effects of the old custom of rotary motion, or rocking, and the benefit resulting from the more rational and healthy substitute of this new invention.

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

NEW SERIES.—NUMBER XIII.

SHAKESPEARE has very well divided life into seven ages; these, however, are only the progressive periods of a journey, along which we glide so imperceptibly that we scarcely make distinctions between them. How gradually the infant shoots up into the boy; how swiftly and invariably slip by the years that deepen his "reed voice" to the tones of manhood, and give him understanding, passions, penetration, intellect, and character! The shouts of our school-days yet ring in our ears, and their simple thoughts and uncorrected hopes retain their clinging grasp upon the mind and the imagination, while we are extending our plans abroad over wider space, and with more important influence, and mingling on terms of equality with the strong, the wise, and the aged of men. But there are eras which are marked by sudden and distinct transitions. Of these, one is marriage.

The talents of writers have long been exhausted upon the joys and sorrows of lovers. It has been a custom to conduct them through adventures of every possible difficulty, and at length to bind them together in marriage at the close of the story, as if all the interest and romance of life were there brought to a conclusion. Novels and plays, therefore, generally satisfy themselves with gaining this point; and after uniting in the patient yoke of matrimony two individuals who, through a moderate lapse of years, have languished for each other, they commit their future destinies to oblivion, or to the imagination of the reader, as unworthy of further investigation. This is an error. It is true the ardour of youthful lovers, their excited and perpetual aspirations for each other, the poetic light which the passion sheds around the character of its temporary victim, the incidents by which the comparatively cold and selfish world interfere with their ethereal habits of thinking and feeling, and the perseverance, courage, and faith, by which triumph is obtained, or the anguish, imaginary as it often is, consequent upon misfortune, seem to form materials for narration more rich and easily wrought up, than the tame and spiritless monotony of wedded bliss; but to the tranquil observer of human nature, the latter affords much for study; much which, analyzed with skill, may be applied to the improvement and happiness of his race. Besides, youth is often wasted in mere illusion. The character is scarcely formed, the passions imperfectly developed. The energies of the mind are not brought into the great action and struggle of life, in the promotion of important designs, or the creation of permanent and extensive consequences.

The affections of the husband, wife, father, and mother, the most ennobling and strongest incentives to exertion, are yet unplanted in the heart. But marriage, if properly entered into, while it disperses many wild and agreeable conjectures, and represses perhaps a few idle impulses of ambition, awakens deeper, firmer, more matured, and enduring feelings. It calls in upon the bosom a thousand wasted and wandering thoughts; it gathers up the affections which have hitherto been broadly diffused and scattered among a multiplicity of objects, and concentrates them within a narrower circle, where, if their empire is more confined, it is also more pure and absolute. The duties, the dangers, the miseries, and the happiness of a married life, therefore, should not be neglected; but it should be the endeavour of gifted minds to irradiate the domestic life with the light of intelligent observation, and to shed around its deep quiet hopes, its weighty responsibilities, its tried and enduring tenderness, the charms of poetry, not so brilliant perhaps and thrilling as that which paints love's dawning sky, but more full of mildness and truth.

I was alone in my apartment. My favourite twilight hour had crept imperceptibly upon my reflections; the red broken embers from the hearth, with their dim and dusky rays, painted the walls and ceiling with shadows; a corresponding quiet and repose spread itself pleasantly over my thoughts, and I enjoyed a pleasure in the mere workings of my own mind.

As I reached this point in my sage cogitations, the lurid light of the room seemed altering its colour. Its crimson changed to a fainter hue, which, brightening into a silvery and moonlight tinge, suddenly dispersed the lowering shadows, and the Little Genius was before me.

So on some dusky summer evening, when the heavens are obscured with masses of gloomy vapour, the queen of night peeps from the breaking clouds, revealing the hills, the woods, and streams.

"Thou art right, master student," he said, "your poets are very apt to flutter around the maiden while she threads the flowery paths of courtship, and fly away when they have at length conducted her to the dignified retreat of matrimony. But I will show thee the wife as well as the mistress. Thou shalt see the fire-side as well as the grove, and let us examine if beauty bears the light of morning, the grasp of care, the touch of disappointment, and the blight of age, as gracefully as the rays of the morn the glow of pleasure, the fire of hope, and the buoyancy of youth."

I looked in the magic glass; a few shadows passed like clouds across its surface, and melting away, left a morning scene of uncommon loveliness. It was in the fulness of nature's richest season. The earth from her dark bosom had yielded all her precious essences in the shapes of flower, grain, and foliage. Broad undulated meadows of velvet grass were varied with fields of waving corn and yellow grain, and the eye could pierce into the thick and luxuriant woods, where the sweet and joyful cry of the woodpecker, and the sleepy voice of the crow, woke its echoes. A narrow river swept around the base of a hill, which sometimes sloped down to its transparent waters in grassy lawns, and sometimes jutted boldly into its bosom in broken cliffs or mossy granite. A beautiful path wound along its banks; in the neighbourhood of which, and half buried among the branches of some giant oaks, gleamed the white columns of a mansion, devoted to the purposes of education. I deemed at first that youths of my own sex here resorted to fit themselves for the various struggles of the mighty world, and with fond recollections I looked to behold the airy kite, the winged ball, or the whirling hoop, and I listened for the voices of the careless crowd now collected in infant merriment together, whom a few rapid years would scatter over the face of the globe, and doom to joy or sorrow, obscurity or greatness, crime or virtue, the warriors, the patriots, the rulers of the nations, or the spectators of human life.

"No," said the Genius, who knew what was passing in my mind, "these are gentle maidens whose paths lie in retired places. But even here is as much material for speculation, for here also is variety of disposition, character, and talent. Here, also, are hopes and fears, candour and deceit, nobleness and meanness, hatred and love, just as admirable and displeasing as if cased in the most ordinary form of manhood, instead of stealing through the world in the accidental lineaments of feminine beauty. Here exactly as in the other walks of life will innocence sometimes be censured and feeling insulted. Here impudence will snatch rewards from modesty, and hypocrisy assume the mask of virtue. Here wit and genius, and sweetness of temper, and elevated character, will pass side by side with duplicity, cruelty, and ignorance; and even here also will beauty depend upon its exterior fascinations, neglecting the inward grace of soul and health of understanding; and they, unblest with dazzling eyes and rose-bud lips, will cultivate their moral and intellectual endowments, and in the light of spirit far outshine the feeble and evanescent rays of mere superficial and personal loveliness. But see, beneath the shade of yonder arbour, what forms appear."

His gesture directed my attention to two sweet girls, who entered the pathway. From their conversation and appearance I perceived that they were young, wealthy, and amiable. I was particularly attracted by one. She was of a very fair and graceful figure. The simplicity of true taste was discovered in her dress, as well as in her looks and actions. There was something soft and pleasing in the tones of her voice, and her speech was of the truth and tenderness of her friendship. She protested to her companion that she would never forget her, but that the ardour of her affection would only increase with years. The other was older, and of a more serious demeanour. There was less vivacity and vividness in her manner; but I thought her feelings were deeper and more unchangeable, and that the glow of quiet and powerful love, with which she regarded her young friend, was darkened by a want of confidence, not in her present sincerity, but in the resolution of her character, in her strength to resist the allurements and temptations which ensnare the steps of youthful beauty. When she spoke it was at once with the dignity of a superior, and with the grace, familiarity, and affection of an equal and a friend. "Dear girl," she said, "I believe what you say. I believe you love me, and that you do not realize the possibility that you can ever cease to love me. We have gone through the thousand adventures of the school like sisters. Your hand has been in mine, even as it is now, in mirth and in sorrow, and I well know we have loved each other; but, Caroline, we are about to separate. For me the world has few temptations. I value not its charms; I shall not seek its pleasures. Its dangers are numerous and fatal, its promises high and bewildering, but too often false. You are gay, refined, and witty. You have beauty to attract observation; you have accomplishments to fascinate; and feelings wild, undisciplined, romantic, and unmanageable; open to all impressions, and lightly led astray. When you become engaged in the labyrinth of fashionable occupations, will you be the same free-hearted girl you now are? My father has hinted to me that he is involved in pecuniary embarrassments. Perhaps his fortunes are changed; if so—"

She stopped, for tears were gathering in the blue eyes of the lovely girl, who gazed up with a look so reproachful that she smothered the doubt which had arisen in her mind, and exclaimed, "Forgive me, dear girl, I have wronged you; you will never forget me."

The scene passed away, and instead of the winding river and shady path, I beheld the interior of a spacious, richly-furnished apartment, filled with a fashionable assemblage, in pursuit of pleasure. Among the rest was one, in whose radiant face I recognised the warm-hearted Caroline. But she was changed. Her youthful expression, her unrestrained and unconscious actions, and the simple style of dress, were no more to be distinguished. The hair, once parted on her white forehead, and falling over her shoulders in ringlets, was now twisted up into frizzles and braids, and towered above her head, in all the pomp and pride of fashion; rings were flashing from her fingers; and her step, once as free as the wing of a wild bird, was trained into a stately and haughty gait, as if conscious that she was the object of notice and admiration. But these were only outward alterations. By the aid of the Genius, I was made sensible of the much more important revolution which had taken place in her disposition and habits of thinking. Her pure and generous principles, her unbent and luxuriant affections, her native intelligence, good sense, and sweetness of temper, were gone; and what filled their place? Pride, vanity, a feverish thirst for applause and admiration, selfish ambition, refined distinctions of gentility and etiquette, and the contracted thoughts and corrupted taste of a mere belle and coquette. Alas! that woman should ever fling away from her bosom the gentle impulses, the lofty and precious attributes of nature and intellect, for toys and trash like these! Near her stood her friend. She had also changed, for the marks of trouble were on her countenance. Her dress bespoke one not distinguished in the ranks of fashion; and the sedateness of her face had deepened into melancholy.

"Behold," said the Genius, "the two friends who, a few years ago, wandered together in the warmth of early love, among the purifying scenes of nature. They have been parted by the common occurrences of life. The principle of change, which stirs in all things, has wrecked the fortunes and the happiness of the one, while it has only ripened the charms of the other, extended the circle of her fame, and multiplied the sources of her enjoyment. The path of yonder calm and pensive maiden has been through scenes of sickness. Blighting neglect has sunk, like a poisoned arrow, into her heart, and wearing struggles have wasted her once glowing hopes. The youth which her friend has spent in lofty triumphs and soothing pleasures, she has borne in pain, retirement, and solitude of heart, for even the generous of the world seek not out for objects of sympathy or affection; and the proud true spirit, when stricken down by some lightning-bolt of fate, presses itself not forward upon the path of gaiety and affluence, but steals away, like the wounded deer, to bleed, and perhaps to die, in the gloomiest shadows. She has, however, this evening sought this brilliant scene with the hope of meeting the companion of her happier days."

"And why," inquired I, "does she not spring forward into her arms?"

"Look," said the Genius, "their eyes meet. A shade of crimson mounts into her pale cheeks, but passes away—for the bright eyes of Caroline having perused her countenance with a cold and momentary glance, have turned their flashes in another direction."

"And why does she not hasten to embrace her; perhaps she knows her not?"

"Oh yes," replied the Genius, "but it would not be gentle."

I perceived that my young belle had formed the deliberate design of breaking off all connexion with her who could add nothing to her circle but sadness and misfortune.

Beautiful and fascinating as this fair creature certainly was, she appeared to me at this moment divested of all powers to charm; and although I beheld many eyes turned on her with unfeigned and unconcealed admiration, and although I had myself been the preceding moment regarding her with feelings almost of tenderness, yet the chilling influence of a bad heart, or a contracted understanding, banished it in a moment.

I looked upon her as one who had fallen the victim of a foul disease, which, however it left at present no traces upon her complexion, and struck no misery into her heart, must, nevertheless, eventually overwhelm her in ruin. She seemed like some fair ship, with sails all spread, gliding gracefully along a rapid current, whose swift and smooth lapse tends to the whirlpool.

Again the objects faded away, and the glass discovered a rich apartment. The belle was there; but a belle no longer. She was married to a man of wealth, talents, and virtue; and this was her home. "Come back early, Charles," she said to her husband, as she rested her form upon his arm. "I scarcely ever see you now." He touched her forehead lightly with his lip, and left her. She sat down alone in the midst of her gorgeous dwelling, and gazed into the fire. She arose and took up one of the annuals, and turned over its rich engravings with a carelessness which proved that, while her small hand was trifling with its delicate leaves, her mind was wandering. A moment's silence ensued. The book fell upon the carpet, her lip quivered, and she burst into tears.

"Strange," said I; "why should she weep? She has all worldly advantages. Wealth and fashion are around her, for which she has longed so ardently, and for which she has sacrificed so much. She is united to the man she loves, and they are the envy and the admiration of the gay world. If she has a wish, be it but a caprice, she need but speak to be obeyed. Strange, that she would weep."

"The advantages which you have enumerated," replied the Genius, "are outward and ineffectual. True, she has wealth, fashion, and success in life. Broad mirrors are blazing around her. She may not raise her eyes but they rest upon some costly ornament or sculptured marble; her slender foot presses a carpet, whose hues seem stolen from the heavens; and her rooms are thronged at her pleasure with the rich, the high, the great, and the beautiful. But ask thy solitary heart, master student, if these alone would satisfy its yearnings. Nay, if so far from being a consolation for any degraded principle or lost affection, they would not be to thee a mockery. This mistaken girl has been united to one noble, high, and intellectual. His principles are proud, his honour stern, his affections deep, and his views of nature broad and liberal; a keen susceptibility to female charms has betrayed him into an engagement with this beautiful and heartless woman; but his stern regard has already pierced through her flimsy affectations. She was gifted by nature with feelings as generous, pure, and acute as his own. But she has been ruined by education; yet she has sufficient heart to love her husband, and to feel the anguish of having lost his respect. He treats her with kindness, but she knows it is forced and cold, springing from principle, not love. She is with him, but she cannot be his companion; she has broken down her intellectual energies, she has poisoned her native feelings for paltry and contemptible distinctions. They for whose worthless smiles she turned away from nature and truth may yet flatter, but can neither deceive nor delight her. In an interval of feeling she sent an apology to her insulted friend, with a request that they might be reunited in friendship, but the cold reply, that 'she was not disposed to aspire to the honour of an acquaintance so far above the ordinary affections of life,' at once wounded her feeling and her pride.

"This is a simple lesson, master student, but to one young and ardent, like you, and particularly to one whom beauty bewilders, and whose nature bends at the tone of a sweet voice, it is not without its use. Look around you with care, and form your opinions cautiously. Many a sweet face shines over a character of similar unmeaning thoughts, low tastes, and withered affections, and many cherish attributes as sweet and gentle as the music of the nightingale, beneath an appearance as plain."

And so off went the Little Genius, with a very serious face, and left no vestige of his visit but the good advice. To be sure it is very fine, and I shall bear it in mind gratefully, although it seems to me that he is a little prosing when he gets upon the subject of female beauty. The thought passed through my fancy, (I am very much given to these out of the way conceptions,) that some female Little Genius had played him a trick in the course of his wanderings; but I soon discarded the idea as totally inconsistent with his dignity. On the whole, I suspect he does not know as much about the girls as he does about philosophy, metaphysics, and such things; and in my heart I cannot help hoping, that he gets his opinions on this subject from Saturn, or Mars, or some such outlandish place, and that all our young ladies are as good as they are handsome. It is an excellent thing, however, to be on one's guard.

F.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

THE RAMBLER.—NUMBER XII.

SPRING.

Lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone. The flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land.—Song of Solomon, chap. II.

EVERY year, all the periodicals, in every city, in every country of the earth, have something to say upon the subject of spring, and have had something to say since time was, or at least, since periodicals were born, and will continue to have something to say until time shall cease to be. It is, in all respects, a most prolific theme, and there is no more chance of exhausting it, than of exhausting our kind mother earth of grass, and leaves, and flowers, and the never-dying vegetative principle. The reason is obvious enough: last year's grass, and leaves, and flowers are dead and past away—their freshness and fragrance are forgotten, and their beauty is remembered no more; so it is with the essays, and reflections, and songs, and sonnets that sprung into life in the spring of eighteen hundred and twenty-nine—they also have passed away, and their sweet thoughts and pretty sayings are likewise remembered no more; but as last year's vegetation fell to the earth and became incorporated with it only to be reproduced again in forms of fresh brilliancy and beauty, so do the thoughts and images of former writers assume a new shape, and bear the impress of the present time by appearing in all magazines and newspapers, daily, weekly, and monthly, for the year eighteen hundred and thirty. And there is no plagiarism in all this; it is merely, as Puff says, "two people happening to think of the same idea, only one hit upon it before the other—that's all." Indeed, who would think of plagiarism on such an exhaustless subject as spring? Why a thousand thoughts and images that have lain dormant in the mind start into life at the mere mention of the word. As the fresh April breeze, laden with "unwritten music" and healthful fragrance, blows upon you, it becomes a sort of natural impulse to vent your feelings either by pen or speech. You look back upon the snow, and fog, and sharp unfeeling winds of winter as upon a desolate waste over which you have trodden, and fancy, as you see nature putting on her youthful gay attire, that you are entering into another and better state of existence; forgetful that though her spring may be eternal, your own is fitting fast away, never to be renewed. But no reflections! let them come with winter, their fitting season. Spring was made for enjoyment, or rather, anticipation of enjoyment—promises of good—pleasant visions, and gorgeous castles in the air. Experience convinces not the young. They think not of their last year's visions that have faded away, or the aerial castles that tumbled about their ears; or if they do, it is only to contrast their frailty with the firm texture and sure foundation of those in the perspective.

"Hope springs eternal in the human breast;
Man never is, but always to be blest."

is as true as any two lines that were ever spoiled by quotation. But though spring is delightful to all classes, it is so to each in a different way, and for a different reason. In the country, your true agriculturist, though he wander amid a wilderness of sweets, marks not the tiny buds that are expanding and blooming into beauty all around—to be sure, he hopes that no killing frost will come and spoil his prospects of cider, but that is all. These are too small concerns for his capacious head. He ponders on acres of corn and fields of buck-wheat, and plans where barley should be sown and where oats. He looks into futurity and calculates how much the yet unengendered grain will bring; he schemes how his barren land may be artificially fertilized in the best and cheapest manner, and it is his business, not his pleasure, to take note of the wonderful operations of nature. His wife considereth the dairy, and looketh out with motherly care that her sleek and velvet-coated cows be not turned from their winter quarters into damp and swampy meadows, lest they contract colds, coughs, catarrhs, and other disorders incident to cattle; while the rosy-cheeked daughter attends to the poultry, (always the daughter's perquisite) and literally "reckons her chickens before they are hatched." Anxiously does she watch that the young turkeys (the most tender of domestic fowls) do not get wet feet; for on the proceeds arising from their sale depend the splendour of the gown and the quantity and quality of the ribbon that have in summer to adorn the village church, and excite the wonder and admiration of its simple congregation. So passes spring with them and others of their class. They talk and think less of its beauties than those who merely get glimpses of them in crowded cities, and have to draw upon their imaginations for the rest.

In the city spring brings with it a still more multifarious collection of hopeful schemes and projects. Business that has been in a state of stagnation during the winter now flows briskly through a thousand different channels; and the ladies, whose business is pleasure, are busier than any one else, for the spring fashions have come; milliners are now the most obsequious of people; tailors examine with a curious eye the coats of their customers as they meet them in the streets, and inquire most kindly and disinterestedly after their health and prospects; merchants are scattering their ventures abroad, ships are fitting out, much beef is salted down, and many biscuits baked, but a number of hard things said about the tariff notwithstanding; the North river is emancipated from ice, and owners of steam boats are preparing to oblige the public and ruin themselves by vigorous competition; the rustling of silks is heard in Broadway, criticisms upon hats, gowns, and trimmings are much in vogue amongst the fair creatures who pace its fashionable side, and they look upon spring as the most charming season of the year, "it is so delightful for morning calls!"

Spring is coming! all good things are coming! and some good things are going—oysters are going—there will soon be no more in the month, and then they are gone; but shad are coming and Clara Fisher is coming; strawberries and pretty country girls are coming, so is fresh butter; the men of Rochester and Buffalo, and other districts of the "far west" have come, and they wander up and down the streets in "wrapt amazement" at the never-ceasing jingling of myriads of forte-pianos, and the twanging of guitars, harps, and other stringed instruments; the sons of the south have come, and Virginians, Carolinians, and Georgians are to be seen sauntering along, and gazing with horror at the shocking quantity of freedom enjoyed by the poor black wretches they chance to meet, mentally exclaiming,

"Can such things be,
And overcome us like a summer cloud
Without our special wonder?"

and though they see it every summer, they are never able to get over the astonishment created by beholding a dark dandy or an African coquette—as if white people possessed the exclusive right to make fools of themselves. "Ah!" think they, as a coloured gentleman unceremoniously takes the wall of them—"Ah! if I only had you in Savannah!"

But spring has still its sad feelings, and after levity comes heaviness of heart. It is a joyous season to those who, like the year, are in their spring-time, just bursting into untried life; but to such as have seen that time pass away for ever, whose spirits are depressed by difficulties, or broken by unavailing struggles, it is a season rather of melancholy retrospection than present enjoyment. The aged or unfortunate are insensible to its influence; they recall their springs, and mournfully contrast the happy past with the dreary present: truly it is said,

"Joy's recollection is no longer joy While sorrow's memory is sorrow still;"

and deeply do they feel its truth. To those in their prime it is, at times, perhaps sadder still to look back upon the flowery fields of existence they have rambled through, and contrast them with the beaten track they now tread, and the desolate prospect that lies before them. The friends of their youth have passed away, so have their brightest hopes; they feel themselves changed, and their capacities for happiness diminished; they see things full of joy and promise around, and are filled with a mixture of worldly scorn and unavailing regret for what can no more be theirs; and sadly do they enter into the feelings of the poet—

"The sky is blue, the sward is green,
The leaf upon the bough is seen,
The wind comes from the balmy west,
The little songster builds its nest,
The bee hums on from flower to flower,
Till twilight's dim and pensive hour,
The joyous year returns—but when Shall by-past times come back again?"

C.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

PORTRAITS OF CELEBRATED CHARACTERS.

CANOVA.

THE subject of our present sketch adds another to the list of genius, struggling through every possible difficulty until it at length overcomes the barriers which impede its progress, and finally attains the goal of its most sanguine wishes.

Antonia Canova was born at Passagus, a small village in the Venetian territory, of parents whose poverty disabled them from giving to the genius his early youth displayed, the usual cultivation or encouragement; but he resolutely struggled with every difficulty, and at length triumphed over his fate.

Many curious anecdotes are related of his first efforts in the art in which he subsequently became a distinguished master.

The paintings and sculpture which adorned the small church of his native village first attracted his youthful admiration, and gave him a predilection for the profession of an artist. His rude attempts at forming objects, either animate or inanimate, which he is described as executing with a facility and truth, surprising both for his premature age and the want of any regular instruction, attracted the attention of the padre of the village, who directed his youthful genius, as far as the limited powers the reverend father possessed could assist him. Several of these incipient proofs of Canova's early genius are still preserved, and are considered strong proofs of the extraordinary bias of his mind, and the deep-rooted affection he must, at this period, have imbibed for the art in which he was shortly to become so eminently celebrated.

At the age of fourteen he sculptured two baskets of fruit, which are esteemed beautiful specimens; they are now in the staircase of the Palazzo Farsetti at Venice. The next year, when only fifteen, he executed Eurydice, his first statue. Shortly afterwards he finished Orpheus, both of which have been preserved with equal veneration and care.

Having now acquired a reputation, confined indeed to the small circle of his immediate neighbourhood, he was determined to try his fortunes in a more elevated sphere; and, for this purpose, before he had attained the age of twenty, he set out for Rome, that repository of the arts, taking with him his first executed groups in marble, Dædalus and Icarus, which he had lately finished.

His first application was to the Venetian ambassador, resident at Rome, whose patronage he in vain solicited. He met a similar fate in other efforts with the rich and great in Rome; but, when almost reduced to despair, without money and friends, he became known to Sir William Hamilton, the English ambassador at Naples, whose discernment immediately saw the genius of the young artist, and whose munificence furnished him with the means of prosecuting his studies, and of establishing himself at Rome. To this his first patron, and to all his family, Canova through his subsequent life ever manifested the warmest gratitude.

Through this patron his merits shortly became known to others; even the Venetian ambassador now condescended to notice his young countryman, and ordered a specimen from his masterly chisel. The justly celebrated groups of the Theseus and Minotaur was the result of this command, and the lately neglected Canova was admitted to be a worthy successor to those celebrated sculptors who had flourished in the proudest days of Grecian and Roman greatness. A few years afterwards he executed the tomb of Pope Ganganelli. His fame was now completely established; he became the rage; orders poured in from all the cognoscenti of Europe, and the atelier of Canova was the most frequented of any living sculptor. One of his latest works was the splendid statue of Washington, intended for the capitol of the city which bears the name of that distinguished man. Honours were lavished upon him in abundance; among which may be mentioned his creation by the pope of a marchese, with an annual income of three thousand piastres, the whole of which sum Canova dedicated to the support and encouragement of poor and deserving artists.

Canova is represented to have been an extremely amiable character in private life. Warm and kind in his disposition, noble and generous in his feelings, devotedly attached to the love of the fine arts, simple and unpretending in every thing relating to himself, which gave an additional charm to his exalted genius.

The talents of Canova were not confined to sculpture; painting was also his favourite pursuit, and in the specimens left of his devotion to this sister art, may be traced the same excellence, which, directed more closely to his profession, has ranked him first in the list of sculptors of his age.

We have mentioned the liberal appropriation he made of the funds allowed him by the pope, numerous acts of similar generosity are mentioned of him; his charities were extensive, and performed secretly and without ostentation. At the time of his death he was building a church in his native village, for which he bequeathed funds to complete. He died at Venice, on the 12th October, 1822, universally regretted, no less as the reviver of his art than for his amiable character as a man. Rome mourned his loss as a national calamity, and the adventurer who had entered her city, without fortune or a name, received at his death all the public demonstrations of grief and respect, paid only to the dignified and the illustrious!

Violent love is the worst of all reasons for marriage; a couple who have no better reason for uniting, seldom continue long happy.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

HORTICULTURE.

WE make the following extract from the able and learned address of John W. Francis, M. D. delivered at the last anniversary of the New-York Horticultural Society. It will be read with pleasure by all who take an interest in horticultural pursuits:

La Belle France, the country of chivalry and romance, was distinguished at an early period for her taste and cultivation in horticulture; even so early as in the time of Charlemagne, who is probably the first to have contributed royal opulence to this purpose in that nation. To this early date we refer the introduction into that country of the best fruits; the cultivation of orchards and vineyards. Francis the First adopted the gardening of Italy, as a part of the decorations of the palace of Fontainebleau. In the time of Louis XIV. the philosopher Evelyn visited the garden of Versailles. He speaks with enthusiasm of its elegance and taste.

In Le Notre, that munificent monarch found one whose style was as rich and gorgeous as his own, and the nation was delighted with the novelty and brilliancy of his designs. A diversity of taste has led to a diversity of decision as to the merits of these magnificent gardens; they are reported to have cost two hundred millions of francs. The style of Le Notre is, however, still followed; and of a similar character, though less costly, we find the establishments of Meudon and Trianon.

Agricola, a Dutch writer, observes, that the sight of Versailles gave him a foretaste of paradise; and Bradley remarks, Versailles is the sum of every thing that has been done in gardening.

Of the innumerable establishments for the promotion of physical science which diversify, embellish, and enrich France, and more especially of those which are devoted to botanical and horticultural knowledge, the present does not offer a suitable occasion to speak; but I may be permitted yet to notice one institution, which by universal consent is the theme of admiration and praise to every one alive to the harmonies of nature. The garden of plants founded by Louis XIII. is the noblest establishment of the kind in the world. Nothing even approaching to it has ever elsewhere been known. The spectator of this enchanted spot will here find the eye delighted, and the imagination excited and gratified, while surveying the wonderful varieties and forms of beauty displayed by the vegetable products of every clime. Here he will feel himself almost transplanted, as by enchantment, among the rich plains of India, and the heath-covered wilds of Southern Africa; here he will find the resplendent blossoms of the canna, the sterlizia, and the magnificent foliage of the bigonia and the dombia. From nature's self he may turn to the ingenuity and devices of man, the minister of nature.

In inspecting the vegetable museum he will here see Du Hamel's own specimens of his experiments on trees; the original herbarium of Tournefort and of Vaillant; the collections of the Michaux, and evidences without number, of the labours and scientific classifications of Jussieu, a true philosopher, the founder of the Ordines Naturales, a work which has divided the judgment of the profoundest investigators of the vegetable kingdom into two great parties, of Linneans and Anti-Linneans.

The experimental department of the garden will exhibit to him an almost endless variety of display in the mode of training fruit trees, whether standards or espaliers. The resources and tenacity of vegetable life will be unfolded to him by the most unexpected and complex forms of successful ingrafting. In the year 1816, I visited this magnificent temple of nature, and its vast treasures were rendered the more accessible to my examination by the kindness and civility of the venerable Desfontaines, the professor of botany to the royal garden, whose reputation is fixed in the list of nature's expositors by the publication of his Flora Atlantica. The pride of nativity could not but swell in my veins, when I was informed, and saw with my own eyes, that pre-eminent among the magnificent and beautiful hardy exotics of the garden, shone our North American forest trees, the enduring platanus and the fragrant magnolia.

But this institution is devoted not only to the beauties of nature but consecrated as the temple of science. In the walks of this garden Buffon composed his immortal history of creation, portraying its character and depicting its beauties; forming the noblest chant to the glory of the Maker, in the illustration of his works. Would that this sublime genius had not sullied it by impurity, and debased it by ingratitude. What a striking example of the occasional obliquity of the human mind does he afford, who under the shade of the mightiest trees of the garden, the exotics of our own soil, could write that, in America, nature had belittled her productions.

Perhaps it was characteristic of him who could behold with philosophic composure his own marble statue, with an inscription that transgresses all bounds of modesty, and might by the most liberal be deemed impious.

"Majestati nature per ingenium!"

"A genius equal to the majesty of nature!"

In this devoted spot, the no less distinguished Cuvier, under the patronage of the late emperor Napoleon, has given system and symmetry to the science of nature, and completed that structure of which Aristotle, under the direction of Alexander, laid the corner-stone.

In Italy the Medici are distinguished as the revivers of gardening, as well as of literature and the fine arts. From their example it received an impulse, which is visible in every part of that delightful country. The prodigality of nature has here been such, as to lessen the necessity of exertion on the part of these degenerate descendants of the Romans; and we do not recognise among them an elevated science in their horticulture and husbandry.

The gardens of Lombardy boast the most luxuriant vegetation in Europe. The ducal garden at Florence, and the villa of Rome, are objects of curiosity to every traveller.

In this land of taste and song, of Dante and Rossini, where both the severer and the polite branches of knowledge have been most profitably cultivated by the gentler sex, one of the most elaborate works on the philosophy of nature, the vegetable statistics of Dr. Hales has been improved and illustrated by the accomplished Lady Signora Maria Angela Ardinghelli.

Our Dutch forefathers, in the land of their birth, were no less devoted to the elegant villa than to the pursuits of wealth, and few of their opulent merchants but possessed their garden on the banks of some one of the numerous canals of that interesting country. Indeed, prior to the cultivation of horticulture in England, we find that Holland supplied London with her best esculent plants, and the various choice productions of the kitchen garden.

The botanic garden at Leyden is an object of peculiar interest, from its early establishment and its venerable age; and above all, from its connexion with the name of the illustrious Boerhaave, the ornament of the medical profession and of human nature. Here, after the fatigues of public instruction and professional avocation, he recreated in the philosophy of nature. I have often seen the good old man, before the morning dawn, says his beloved disciple, the Baron Von Haller, perambulating about the garden, in his wooden slippers, that he might more immediately superintend the culture of plants, and speculate on their flowers and fruits.

In Holland, says Sir William Temple, "gardening has been the common favourite of public and private men; a pleasure of the greatest, and a care of the meanest; and indeed an employment and a profession, for which no man there is too high or too low." We may add, that their labours are chiefly subservient to practical and economical purposes; yet not so as to neglect the graces and elegancies of the art among the more opulent.

Such then we find to be the results of associate labour and continuous exertions among those nations, who deem that the earth is to be cultivated to bring forth its treasures, and that in conformity to the highest and most imperative ordinance of heaven, the toils of the husbandman are the offering which must be tendered at the altar of Pomona.

Moreover, the history of our species demonstrate the close connection between the arts of husbandry and the condition of our social state. "The mines of a nation," says Franklin, "are but shovel deep." The plough is the pioneer of civilization, and until nations have arrived at this stage of their career, they are justly pronounced barbarous; and wherever this great agricultural instrument has been introduced, it has led to the noblest triumphs of our species, the arts and sciences, and all the glorious offspring of genius.

HONOUR.

The ancients defined honour to be either the observance of virtue or reverence to that merit. The philosophers generally have declared it to consist in probity and usefulness, in the discharge of duties, and the culture of morals. A modern writer of eminence, distinguishing between false modern honour and true dignity, says—the first is that which makes a man assail even the life of his friend for a punctilio or a momentary excitement; the latter, that which makes him despise every paltry affront from others, and apologize for every apparent or unjust affront on his part. The genuine sense of honour in gentlemen of the navy or army would seem to be, earnestness for the attainment of all the knowledge and skill, and the force of resolution, conducive to excellence and efficiency in their professions. So far as fighting belongs to their career, it is for their country, and not for themselves; they have their own lives less at their disposal than mere citizens, because they have specially pledged themselves to their government. Honour must be something positive and universal—theirs cannot be different from that of other gentlemen; or if it differs, the variation arises from the obligation under which they labour, of being particularly tenacious of their lives on other occasions than professional battle or service. It is, therefore, quite an error or superstition in them, to suppose that they are required to resent slighter personal affronts, or to fight duels for slighter cause than other people. The sound part of the world must view their case in the contrary light. Plato understood true honour, when, on being informed that certain persons had spoken ill of him, he observed, "We will lead such a life that none shall believe them."

The honour of youth is to be, in the language of Solomon, "as the morning light, which shineth more and more, unto the perfect day." The unostentatious pursuit of operative worth is their proper business; they cannot be justly said to have any reputation for which to fight or to bluster, until they have qualified themselves, or have begun to serve or to adorn the community to which they belong. Duels, if to be endured at all, are tolerable only in persons of a certain maturity of age, character, and station; who have, as it were, surface and depth of credit and interests to be wounded or outraged.

There are several kinds of valour, very distinct. Mere animal courage is common to brutes, and to a large portion of the vulgarest, the most savage or vicious of the human race. The artificial spirit is that which is produced by particular position, necessity, or other combination of peculiar circumstances. Oftentimes, or in most instances, its immediate source is fear, the dread of punishment, or disgrace. The celebrated orator, Wyndham, a nice critic of human nature, remarked, that this is the principle of discipline; that discipline is essential to the very life and action of armies, and, of course, that "all the high military merits, whose characteristic is courage, grow, like flowers in a hot bed, from what is founded in fear." He carried the doctrine too far; for love of glory, the sense of duty, the alacrity of emulation, are, perhaps, the chief impulses with the higher officers in the career of arms. But no writer has questioned the theory that the courage of duelling or suicide is generally artificial, and resolvable into some sort of cowardice. According to high authority, "the only genuine, comprehensive, and invincible courage, is inseparably connected with universal rectitude and religious hope"—that is, moral courage, guided by reason and philanthropy, and looking to the future as well as the present life.

National Gazette.

A PANTHER HUNT.

A British traveller in Brazil gives the following account of a panther hunt near the Villa de Fernaiba:

"Finding I still persisted in my favourite pursuit, the governor good-naturedly resolved on gratifying me with the spectacle of a panther hunt. Accompanied by his sons, we rode out early in the morning to an extensive plain, in the centre of which was a jungle; into this the Vaqueiros had succeeded in driving, on the previous night, a large panther, preparatory to the morning's sport. We took our station on an eminence which commanded a view of the entire field. The loud barking of the dogs, the wild cries of the huntsmen as they galloped round the skirts of the jungle cheering on the dogs, formed an animated scene. Aroused in his lair, the panther, furious with rage, sprang forth to meet its enemies. The Vaqueiro nearest to the point from which he had issued, now advanced to the attack. He exhibited a beautiful sight, whirling in the air his lasso, and urging forward with the spur the spirited little steed on which he was mounted, whose dilated nostrils, fiery eye-ball, and erect mane, proclaimed his instinctive dread of the enemy in his front. The panther crouched in the act to spring on his advancing foe, but he was forestalled by the well-skilled assailant, who, at the distance of twenty yards, threw his lasso with unerring aim. Scarcely had it left his hand before the well-trained horse wheeled round and flew across the plain, dragging after him the already disabled panther; for with such beautiful precision had the lasso been thrown, that the fore-paw of the animal was fairly strapped to his neck. The whole party now dashed forward to be in at the death. The Vaqueiro, slackening his pace, gradually shortened the length of the cord till he brought his enemy within a few yards of him, and then, in less time than I can narrate it, I saw him leap from his saddle, his broad knife gleaming in the morning sunbeam, and, with the rapidity of lightning leaving the cloud, it was buried in the heart of the panther."

Ibid.

THE FEMALES OF AFRICA.

Among the usages of the females of Africa, the following is related by Richard Lander, in his narrative of Clapperton's last expedition:

"When an infant dies, the mother invariably wears suspended from the neck, and reaching to the bosom, a figure of a child, about six inches in length, and of proportionable thickness, which is carved in wood, and regarded by the people as a token of mourning. This is worn for an indefinite length of time, according to the inclination or caprice of the bereaved parent; and many women do not cast it aside until the expiration of six, eight, and even twelve months, during which they chat to and caress the wooden figure, as if it had been instinct with life and motion, possessed of all the playfulness and endearing manners which distinguished their offspring when alive, and capable of enjoying the effects of maternal tenderness. This singular custom is confined exclusively to Yariba."

Ibid.

FEMALE BEAUTY.

To sum up the whole, the charms that are really indispensable to being beloved may be possessed by every one who is not personally, or mentally, or morally deformed. Let us enumerate them. Firstly—an eye, whether black, blue, or gray, that has the spirit of kindness in its expression. Secondly—a mouth that is able to say a good deal, and all sincerely. Its teeth, kept as clean as possible, must be an argument of cleanliness in general; it must also be very good-natured to servants, and friends that come in unexpectedly to dinner. Thirdly—a figure which shall preserve itself, not by neglecting any of its duties, but by good taste, exercise, and the dislike of gross living. A woman may be fond of almost any pleasure under the sun, excepting those of tattling, and the table, and ostentation. Fourthly—the art of being happy at home, and making that home the abode of peace. Where can peace dwell if there is not piety? These qualities will sway the soul of man, when the shallower perfections would cease to charm. A good heart is, after all, the best beautifier.

Ladies' Magazine.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Duets.—It is with sincere pleasure we record the fact, alike honourable to the character of the country, and auspicious to the future repose and substantial glory of the American navy, that all the officers engaged in the late duel at Philadelphia, have had their names struck from the roll, and been dismissed the service. Into the merits of this affair we do not intend to enter—they are of no consequence except to the parties themselves—but with the general influence which personal combat, hitherto indirectly permitted by government, has exerted, and might still exert over the country at large, we are deeply concerned. Barbarous and bloody in the extreme, the relic of dark ages of crime and superstition, and resorted to, in a great majority of instances, not for the vindication of lofty principles, or the defence of female honour and beauty, but for the most trivial and ridiculous provocations, its practice is a disgraceful stain on the pages of modern history. Let its very record be wiped away as soon as possible. The executive of the United States deserves, and will receive, full credit for his prompt and efficient measures on this occasion, and will, it is devoutly to be hoped, form an invariable guide for the future rulers of the land.

Webster's Abridged Dictionary.—Our indefatigable lexicographer evinces an unremitting disposition to supply the wants of the primary schools. How well fitted he is to accomplish the arduous and useful task, the history of education in the United States bears ample testimony on its records, and the present undertaking, humble as it may appear, is by no means likely to derogate from his well earned reputation, or to be attended with less usefulness to the rising generation. The large Dictionary is altogether unsuitable, from its dimensions, for the school-room or the counting-house. The present edition will form a very acceptable substitute.

Bank failures.—We have received several communications in relation to the disastrous events connected with the stopping of payment by certain banks. Deeply sympathising with the distress occasioned by the circumstance, and anxious to promote any measures which may obviate its recurrence, and put an end to the fraud in which they so often originate, we should gladly give a place to some of the articles; but want of room compels us to decline doing so. In the newspapers they will prove appropriate and welcome subjects for discussion.

Boston Courier.—The editor of this journal misunderstands the tenor of our last card. We did not intend to convey the remotest suspicion of his having knowingly copied an original production from our columns without due credit. His well known sense of honour and justice, and his uniform conduct towards his contemporaries, forbid the idea. We have not a file of the Courier, or we would point out the number in which the article alluded to appeared. We agree with him in opinion that the custom so prevalent among editors in this country, of designating each other in their public intercourse by name, is an odious one, and ought to be reformed. By no single circumstance has the American press been more degraded. It has thus been converted into an engine of personal warfare, in the management of which all considerations of self-respect, mutual forbearance, and the honour and dignity of the profession itself, are frequently entirely banished from the recollection. The promotion of public good, the advancement of knowledge, as well as the gratification of intelligent curiosity, which does not delight to dwell on individual and trivial disputes, are lost sight of, and the great end of an enlightened press is thus left unaccomplished.

Metamora.—Our readers have probably all laughed merrily over the humorous and broad caricatures of Johnson, as exhibited with masterly skill in his annual "Scrap." They are as little prepared as we were to admire his excellence in the more serious department of his art. He has, however, succeeded in representing our favourite native tragedian to the life, as he appears in his admirable character of the red hero, in a most beautiful print. The execution of this lithograph is spirited, and does full justice to the noble and commanding person, and the dignified attitude of Forrest. It comes further recommended to his friends—and what American is not his friend, and not proud of claiming his genius and talents for his country?—by the exact likeness of the picture.

Green-room chit-chat.—A new opera, from the pen of a gentleman celebrated for his wit, tact, and talent, has been for some time in active preparation, and bids fair to surpass, in success and eclat, every previous production of the kind offered on the American boards. We have been favoured with the perusal of the manuscript, and feel fully warranted in asserting that for neatness of dialogue, and general brilliancy and cleverness of execution, it stands unrivalled by any original production that has ever fallen under our notice. As an evidence of the high estimation in which it is held by the managers, we learn that they intend to bring it forward in the most splendid manner, with new scenery, dresses, and decorations. The music has been composed, selected, and arranged by a gentleman distinguished for his science, taste, and skill; though of a very different description, it is said by judges to be fully equal to that of the Caliph of Bagdad in many respects, and from its wild and romantic character, greatly superior in dramatic effect. Mrs. Austin, for whom we believe the piece was written, will sustain the principal female character, and the whole strength of the company is enlisted to support her. In short, a rich operatic entertainment may be anticipated; and the anxiety of the public, which is quite alive on the subject, will not be disappointed.

Treasurer's Benefit.—It is not often we go out of our way to call attention to the claims of any person connected with the theatre. Indeed, the different individuals that compose that sapient personage denominated the public, have each their particular favourites, whom they make a point of aiding on their benefit nights without taking into consideration any paragraph or paragraphs either for or against their merits or demerits. Mr. Blake, who makes his appeal on Wednesday evening next, is a universal favourite, and deserves to be universally patronized. He is no actor, and never appears in public except in the part of a civil, attentive, and gentlemanly receiver of cash and deliverer of tickets, in which character we have never seen his equal. There are a smoothness and polish about him—a judicious mixture of the suaviter in modo with the fortiter in re, that have for many years secured him the respect and admiration of the frequenters of the Park theatre. His bill is one of the strongest that has been offered this season.

The Euterpeiad.—Mr. G. W. Bleeker intends issuing, simultaneously at New-York and New-Haven, a semi-monthly paper with the above title. It will be devoted principally to the department of music, and contain pieces original and selected, for the voice, piano-forte, organ, flute, clarinet, and other instruments.

Engraving.—Bourne has for sale a likeness of Pope Pius the seventh, from a drawing by Sir Thomas Lawrence, engraved by Cousins.

BLOW, BLOW, THOU WINTRY WIND.

COMPOSED BY DR. ARNE.

ANDANTE.

Blow, blow, thou wintry wind, Thou art not so unkind, thou art not so unkind As man's ingratitude; Thy tooth is not so keen, Because thou art not seen, Thy tooth is not so keen, Because thou art not seen; Al- though thy breath be rude, Al- though thy breath be rude, Al- though thy breath be rude.

SECOND VERSE.

Freeze, freeze, thou bitter sky
That dost not bite so nigh,
As benefits forgot:
Though thou the waters warp,
Thy sting is not so sharp
As friend remember'd not:

VARIETIES.

KEMBLE AND WATSON.—The theatre at Cheltenham, says Kelly, was under the management of the eccentric Watson, who was a fellow of infinite jest and humour. In John Kemble's younger days he was a near ally of his, and both belonged to a strolling company. They lived, or rather, by Watson's account, starved together. At one time, in Gloucestershire, they were left penniless; and after continued vicissitudes, Watson assured me, such was their distress, that at that time they were glad to get into a turnip-field and make a meal off its produce uncooked; and he added, it was while regaling on the raw vegetable that they hit upon a scheme to recruit their finances; and a lucky turn-up it turned out. It was neither more nor less than that John Kemble should turn methodist preacher, and Watson perform the part of clerk. Their scheme was organised, and Tewkesbury was their first scene of action. They drew together in a field a numerous congregation, and Kemble preached with such piety and so much effect, that a large collection rewarded his labours. This anecdote Kemble himself told me was perfectly true.

MADAME CATALANI.—At Bangor Madame Catalani heard the Welsh harp for the first time. The old blind harper of the house was in the kitchen; thither she went, and seemed delighted with the wild and plaintive music which he played; but when he struck up a Welsh jig, she darted up before all the servants in the kitchen, and danced as if she were crazy. Those who saw her thought she never would have finished. On quitting the kitchen, she gave the harper two guineas.

MR. PITT.—The late Mr. Pitt was a remarkably shy man. He was on terms of the greatest intimacy with Lord Camden, and being at his house on a morning visit, "Pitt," said his lordship, "my children have heard so much about you that they are extremely anxious to have a glimpse at the great man. They are just now at dinner in the next room—you will oblige me by going in with me for a moment." "Oh! pray don't ask me; what on earth could I say to them?" "Give them at least the pleasure of seeing you." And half-led, half-pushed into the room, the prime minister approached the little group—looked from their father to them—from them to their father—remained for several minutes twirling his hat, without finding a single sentence at his disposal, and departed. So much for the domestic eloquence of an orator.

EXPENSIVE NICETY.—A special messenger arrived in Chester the other day, after riding nearly one hundred miles, at ten miles an hour speed, for the extraordinary purpose of directing that two commas and a final s should be omitted in an advertisement relative to a certain rail-road!

LUXURY.—At this instant, says Mr. Campbell, the swarthy Indian is braving the ferocity of the ravenous tiger, or nimble leopard, to win from its fierce possession a dappled hamper-cloth for my lord mayor of London. The patient diver is exploring the dim, inconstant depths of the ocean to wring from the maw of the philosophical and contemplative oyster, pale, glistening pearls, to skimmer in the light of Almack's. The dusky Arab urges his headlong steed after the affrighted ostrich, to snatch the feathers that shall wave at St. James's; or the mountain-headed Paupon is tumbling the bird of paradise from his perfumed nest, under the invisible influence of Mrs. Alderman Frizzle; though the scoundrel would eat her, if he could only lay hands on her, with as little remorse as if she were a turtle. The wastes of Siberia cannot shelter the sable; the whale cannot flounder through the icebergs of the Arctic ocean; there is no rest for the stately elephant in the forests of India; and the unwilling lobster must emerge from the sea-caves of Norway; and all, because a bulbous, broad-brimmed, zodiac-waisted, son of Mammon, who may be sitting at this identical moment in the next box to me, for ought I know to the contrary, will not, as the Scottish song says, "let them be."

DULL TIMES WITH HYMEN.—A Portsmouth paper says, it is now about six weeks since we have had occasion to record a marriage in this town.

PLEASANT ANECDOTE.—"In painting," remarks Ibu Batuta, who travelled in China in the fourteenth century, "none come near the Chinese." In proof of this he relates a pleasant anecdote. "I one day entered into one of their cities for a moment; some time after I had occasion again to visit it, and what should I see upon its walls, and upon papers stuck up in its streets, but pictures of myself and my companions! This is constantly done with all strangers who pass through their towns. And should a stranger do any thing to make a fight necessary, they would send out his picture to all the provinces, and he would be in consequence detected."

The friendship of an artful man is mere self-interest; you will get nothing and may lose much by it.

There cannot be a greater treachery than first to raise a confidence, and then to betray it.

There is no one so liable to be angry with others as he who is ill at ease with himself.

GEORGE P. MORRIS, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

Published every Saturday, at 163 William-street, between Beekman and Ann-streets.—Terms four dollars per annum, payable in advance. No subscription received for a less period than one year.

J. SEYMOUR, PRINTER, JOHN-STREET.

NEW-YORK MIRROR,

AND LADIES' LITERARY GAZETTE.

VOLUME VII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 17, 1880.

NUMBER 41.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE DEPARTED.

In the death of this interesting young lady, Miss Julia H. Bedlow, cut off in the bloom of youth, her parents have not only been bereaved of a most lovely and affectionate daughter, but a large circle of friends have been deprived of one who, by her amiable qualities, had endeared herself to all who knew her.—New-York Observer.

And thou the beautiful, alas, art gone!
Gone in the budding spring-time of thy years,
With all thy smiling hopes, that promised fair
A flowery summer and a fruited fall,
Untimely laid in darkness and in dust.
Thou wert beloved of all, for all must love
The gentle and ingenuous of heart;
And such was thine, to virtue ever true,
And tuned to every feeling kind and chaste,
Like delicate harp-strings to the summer winds.
A few brief months erewhile, and thou didst move
Star-like within thy high and courted sphere,
With the elastic buoyancy of one
Whose life is full of freshness and of youth;
While mid the whiteness of thy dimpled cheek
Health spread her carmine, like the rose's blush
Reflected from the lily's glossy snow.
Thy mien was pensive, yet thy heart was light,
Though all unsuited to the frolic play
Of wild unfettered mirth, for from thy prime,
In the dark chambers of thy gentle eyes
Had cloister-courting melancholy mused.
I saw thee oft, not in the banquet hall,
Nor mid the mazes of the stirring dance,
But in retirement's meditative scenes,
'Po contemplation and to friendship dear;
Ay, saw and loved thee too, as I do love
The chosen sister of my boyish years;
And as I gazed upon thy perfect form,
The beauteous casket of a treasured mind,
And listened to the music of thy words,
In harp-like cadence warbling to my ear
The sweet and living poetry of sound,
I've felt impassioned, at that thrilling hour,
How cold and lead-like on an humble name,
The curse, the clog of poverty may lie.
But vain were all regret—thy destiny
Hath mocked the promise of the traitress hope.
Consumption stole with slow insidious step
Into thy bowers of health, fair-futured one,
And leaving still the blush upon thy cheek,
That he might pierce more surely to the heart,
E'en as a cunning miner unperceived,
Relentlessly thy life's frail fabric sapp'd.
I saw the death-damp on thy marble brow—
The shroud, the pall, the coffin, and the bier—
I saw thy last dark couch, the couch of all,
Begirt by weeping ones, and yet no drop
Refreshed the desert of my withered heart;
For tears had sought of solace for the thoughts
That stalked in darkness o'er its silent wastes.
O death, thou stern and ever-restless king!
Why wilt thou pass the bowed and hoary head—
The friendless, hopeless, weary-wandering—
The blighted, sere, and desolate of soul—
That wait impatient on thy lingering call,
And, with a reckless unrelenting hand,
The young, the gay, the beautiful and loved,
In the green freshness of their prime cut down? PROTEUS.

TO MARY.

O what is virtue? 'tis to keep
Each passion under strict control,
Nor let a wily tempter creep
Into the garden of the soul.
It is to conquer selfish pride,
And each inordinate desire;
To take the scriptures for our guide,
And speak and act as they require.
O what is virtue? 'tis to love,
Beyond all things of time and space,
Him who descended from above
To save from death our rebel race;
It is to love the words He spake,
Which none on earth e'er spake before;
His burthen and His yoke to take,
And meekly bear them as He bore.
O what is virtue? 'tis to prize
Another's interest as our own;
In joy or grief to sympathize
For bliss received or pleasures flown.
It is to keep the mind and heart
From every selfish motive free;
To walk by truth's unerring chart—
It is, in short, to be like thee.

W.

THE POET.

The poet seized his new-made pen,
And through his clustering hair
He passed his fingers; once, again
He thump'd—but nought was there!
The poet drew his little stand
Still closer to the fire,
And plied the tongs with desperate hand
Till the bright flame rose higher.
He hoped some bright idea would rise,
Resplendent as the flame,
That might the sleepy world surprise,
And gain for him a name.
He dipp'd his pen, began to write,
As through his casement shone
The crescent planet of the night,
High on her starry throne.
But, "Luna," "Cynthia," "silver moon,"
Might suit an humble pen;
The subject was discarded soon—
The poet dipt again.
He thought of eyes, whose shape and hue
Might well a theme inspire,
But wavered long 'twixt black and blue;
And stirred again the fire;
And nearer hitch'd his elbow chair,
And on the ceiling gazed;
Then on his fingers, thin and fair,
Which ladies oft had praised.
The poet strove to call to mind
Some sweet romantic grove,
Where some "Ianthé," fair as kind,
Had smiled upon his love.
He dipt his pen—the scene was there,
The maiden stood in view;
Then came the look with which the fair
Smiled at his raptures too.
That crimson lip, so curl'd in scorn,
One dash the line effaced—
'Twas not enough—the sheet was torn
On which her name was traced.
The greedy flames the name devour,
That name so soft in rhyme;
And, tell it not—the poet swore!
In terms not quite sublime;
And then he bit his nether lip,
And pull'd his whiskers twice,
'Thought of the proverb—"many a slip"—
But felt—as cold as ice.
He seized a paper, which till then
Had lain neglected by—
"A premium offered!" Where's my pen?
"A hundred lines!" I'll try.
What theme? No matter—from the heart
The numbers need not spring;
I'll write with true poetic art,
Rise, fall, soar—that's the thing!
The poet wrote a poem, and
The premium was his own;
Abundant crops reward the land
Where golden seeds are sown.

ISIDORA.

TO EMILE.

Forget me not! Above life's stream
Let not oblivion's cloudy wing
Eclipse the joy of love's young dream,
Or shadows o'er its lustre fling;
For, as the pilgrim turns to gaze
On Mecca's pure and holy shrine,
So memory's clearest brightest rays
Are poured from those soft eyes of thine!
Forget me not! I could not bear
To think my fate should be to thee
Indifferent as a cloud in air,
Or flickering star-light on the sea;
For I have loved so deep and sure,
So strangely passionate and long,
That it were madness to endure
Life without thee—source of my song!
Forget me not! Oh! come ye hours
With all your memories to her—
To her I loved midst childhood's bowers,
"My boyhood's earliest worshipper!"
Oh long may her enkindled eye
Bear the fair hues of other years;
The azure of a stainless sky,
When dark-blue evening sheds her tears!
Forget me not! I ask thy thought,
Fair houri of my dreams! to be
With kindly recollections fraught,
Of one who ever dreams of thee—

In the gay beauty of the day
That pours around its flood of light,
Or when thy sunset-clouds decay,
And shadows veil the brow of night!

Fair Emile! thou art not vain—
Thou askest not the boon of praise;
Thou needest not the poet's strain,
The enthusiast rapture of his lays;
And trusting in thy wealth of love,
Life's countless cares are all forgot;
The soul is lifted high above,
In numbered changes of my lot!

I know that haughtiness is said
To linger, darkly-stern, with me,
Because my heart has aye essayed
To pour its hoard to none but thee!
To none but thee its wealth is given,
Thou solace of my checkered lot;
Fair star that gilds my future heaven—
Peri of hope! forget me not! EVERARD.

ORIGINAL TALES.

THE SHIPWRECK.

PRESSING circumstances induced me a few years since to take a passage in one of the late fall vessels from Quebec, bound to an English port. The winter season in this truly inhospitable climate had set in unusually early, and with more than its accustomed severity. But two or three outward bound vessels remained in the harbour, and it was even a doubtful case whether these would be enabled to clear the always dangerous, but now nearly closed navigation of the St. Lawrence. A sudden change in the weather, accompanied with a fair wind, however, presented so favourable a prospect to the captain of the barque I had engaged a passage in, that on the morning it took place I was informed of his intention of sailing without further delay. Anxious to reach England, and desirous of escaping a tedious journey over land at this inclement season, I preferred incurring all the risks attendant on this dangerous voyage, than subject myself to the delay and unpleasantness of making a circuitous route to the nearest American port, and going from thence by one of the regular packets. My arrangements were soon made, and I joined the vessel at the hour announced for our sailing.

I had understood that I should be the only passenger, and was agreeably surprised on my arrival on board to find that a lady and gentleman were also to be the companions of our voyage. The captain scarcely had time in the bustle attendant on our getting under weigh, to briefly explain the causes which had so unexpectedly increased our small cabin party. Mr. S. was a young Scotchman, who had been some time settled in Canada as a merchant; an attachment had long subsisted between him and the lady who now bore his name, unauthorised by her relatives; an elopement had been the consequence of this opposition, and they had been privately married only the evening previous to our sailing. The affairs of Mr. S. compelled him to visit his native country, and his young bride had determined to accompany him. Our vessel had been selected as affording certain means of escaping pursuit, and they had effected their embarkation privately, confiding their secret only to a tried friend at Quebec. The peculiarity of the young couple's situation, with the spice of romance attached to it, might have excited a degree of interest in men of more cynical feelings than ever I could lay claim to, added to which, the character of Mr. S. was known to me by reputation as being every way unexceptionable and exemplary. I therefore followed the captain into the cabin, determined to lose no time in putting myself upon easy and familiar terms with my compagnons du voyage.

An introduction was given in due form, and in a few hours we were placed upon a footing of intimacy which it would have taken the intercourse of months to have effected on shore. I had leisure during this period for observing my fair fellow-passenger, and truly a more lovely specimen of British Canadian beauty I had never witnessed during my long residence in the colony. She was tall, but elegantly formed, with features of the pure Grecian cast, set off by a complexion of almost dazzling whiteness, through which the most delicate tint was discernible, that were I at all addicted to poetical imagery, I should compare it to the opening rose-bud, "a peach blossom," "the first rosy tint of morn," or to the innumerable similitudes which a poetic vein can call into existence upon similar emergencies—suffice it, however, to say that such a woman might plead an excuse for the rashness of Mr. S., and that her lady-like demeanour and well-informed mind, might well pardon my poor eulogium on her merits.

The first three days of our voyage were passed in friendly intercourse, rendered more interesting by the peculiarity of our situation, and enlivened by the extremely moderate weather we had hitherto experienced, and the continuance of a favourable wind. We were now reaching the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and confidently hoped that a very short period would place us beyond the immediate danger always to be dreaded on this coast at the advanced season that we were encountering its perils. On the evening of the third day since our departure from Quebec, we were seated in our snug cabin enjoying the luxury of a sea-coal fire, and the enlivening effects of a jug of excellent whisky-toddy, which Mr. S. had concocted with a scientific tact that only a Scotchman is capable of executing. It was the captain's watch below, and induced by the promise that Mrs. S. would charm us with some of the simple melodies of her native Canada, he joined our little party at the expense of his brief allotment of rest. The said jug of whisky-toddy might also have had its due influence—be that as it may, he joined us—and we continued to enjoy ourselves until nearly midnight, when we were suddenly interrupted by the entrance of the officer on watch, who hastily summoned the captain on deck. I saw by the man's countenance that something was amiss, and an increased motion in the ship soon convinced me that a change had taken place in the weather. The loud call of "all hands on deck," quickly brought me to the same spot to ascertain exactly what was going forward. I was immediately put in possession of the cause of alarm; the wind had suddenly changed round to the north-east, and there were evident indications that a strong gale was coming on, accompanied by a snow storm, which bid fair to rage with a violence, from the quarter the wind was now at, only known in these northern latitudes. Our captain was using every exertion which the most experienced nautical skill could put into requisition to make the vessel "tight and trim" to meet the expected shock, and the crew were cheerfully seconding his efforts. Having ascertained the state of things on deck, my next thought was directed to my fellow-passengers. On entering the cabin I found them partially acquainted with our situation, and any anxiety I might have experienced regarding Mrs. S. was soon dissipated by the cheerful salutation she gave me on my entrance; gaily remarking "that she had been too long used to snow storms to be alarmed at so moderate a one as this appeared to be." I saw, however, that there was more an effort at indifference than the real possession of it that she was assuming, evidently proceeding from a wish to calm the agitation of Mr. S. rather than from her not being fully aware of the peril we should be subjected to in the dangerous situation we were placed in. The storm was now raging violently—the vessel heeled with frightful force as if engulfing itself in the raging element which surrounded us, and as it rose reeling and straining from each successive shock, the timbers appeared bursting asunder with the violence of the concussions. After in vain endeavouring to persuade Mrs. S. to retire to her berth, I left her to the care of her now alarmed husband, and again sought the deck. A most appalling scene here presented itself, the terrors of which any description, however vivid, would but inadequately portray. The tempest was raging with all the violence of a tornado, accompanied by a snow storm of that terrific fury which the Canadians term a poudrière, and to add to these accumulated horrors, an impenetrable darkness covered every object—not a star was visible. With difficulty I succeeded in recognising our captain, and endeavoured to obtain his real opinion of our situation. I found him prepared to meet the worst, and which he justly feared no efforts could prevent us from experiencing. The wind was driving us rapidly on the south shore, and the vessel being heavy laden, laboured so violently that she already ceased to obey her helm. We were now running under bare masts, for not an inch of canvass could be hoisted. The cross sea which usually runs in the gulf had been lashed by the fury of the wind into huge mountainous waves, which struck with incredible violence against our frail bark, and threatened with every shock to completely overwhelm us. I was about returning to the cabin with increased alarm when a tremendous sea burst over the stern, rushing like a torrent along the decks, sweeping all before it. Instinctively I grasped the first object which presented itself to my hold; it proved to be the companion hatch. I distinguished the loud shrieks of some poor wretches, whom we subsequently ascertained had been carried into the foaming abyss which yawned around us, and the sound struck to my heart like the death knell to every hope I had previously formed of our escape from the awful perils of this memorable night. Several seconds elapsed before the vessel recovered from the shock; indeed, from the length of time which terror magnified, and the loud crash which simultaneously followed the stroke, I considered the stern must have been stove in; she at length righted, and we soon discovered the extent of our damage. The rudder had been completely torn away, the tiller was also disabled, and the man at the helm was missing. A temporary pause in the elements followed this last calamity, during which I heard the cries of "a leak! a leak!" "the long-boat is washed away!" and "the jolly-boat is dashed to pieces!" I made one leap down the companion ladder, and met a sight which paralysed me with horror, and for a moment rendered me insensible to any concern for myself. The lovely form of Mrs. S. was lying insensible in the arms of her agonized partner—her white garments drenched with the sea, which was rushing into the cabin with fearful violence, her beautiful features were covered with blood, from a wound apparently in the forehead, and her long auburn hair had escaped from its confinement, and was falling in wild profusion around her. I called loudly to her husband to raise himself and bring the fair sufferer on deck, and hastily threw a blanket over her that I snatched from the nearest berth. Mr. S. cast on me a wild and vacant stare, and mechanically assisted me to carry her on deck, which it required almost Herculean strength to gain. We at length succeeded in reaching the weather side of the quarter-deck, and the numerous portions of the disabled rigging furnished materials to lash our lovely burthen to one of the few remaining stanchions. I next secured Mr. S. and myself, as well as the nature of circumstances would permit, to the same place. The vessel was now filling rapidly, and in the occasional pauses of the tempest we could distinctly hear the water rushing between the lower decks. Being timber loaded I felt some hopes that we might escape a watery grave, to meet, perhaps, a more tedious one by cold and famine on this bleak and uninhabited shore. The keen night air, and the continual washing of the spray over us, had roused both Mr. S. and his wife. We contrived to arrange the blanket around her so as to entirely cover her limbs, and I urged every possible chance that might occur ultimately to save us. The storm by this time had somewhat abated of its first violence, and the captain joined our nearly exhausted group. He brought a small flask of brandy he had providentially found, a portion of which we immediately administered to Mrs. S., taking also a small quantity ourselves; its effects were renovating in the extreme, and the hope the captain gave us, that by the exertions of the crew we might still keep the vessel afloat until morning, was further exhilarating. The worthy sailor then suggested that we should obtain a tarpaulin covering, which fortunately lay under the companion ladder, and make a temporary barrier against the waves, an expedient gladly embraced. I bound the cord which fastened me to the stanchion tight around my waist, and gradually extending it, I reached the companion and succeeded, with the aid of the captain, in securing the tarpaulin, together with a portion of the bedding from the mates' berth, which was at the foot of the ladder; thus provided we again reached our companions, and with some difficulty made a tolerably secure covering for us all, under which we placed ourselves, wrapping the bed clothes around Mrs. S. and administering to her another draught from our flask; here we remained secure during the rest of the night. The tempest had now expended its fury, and the snow descended in large flakes, moderating the before excessive coldness of the temperature. We remained two or three hours in this painful and anxious situation. The vessel had settled down to nearly the water's edge and was now as motionless as a log, drifting as the current directed it. The topmasts having been mostly carried away in the early part of the night, may have prevented us from upsetting, as is frequently the case in similar situations with timber loaded vessels. Terror and fatigue had overcome Mrs. S. and she insensibly fell into a sound sleep. I assisted her husband in supporting her, and we passed away the tedious hours by mutually consoling each other with hopes, of the fallacy of which we both were fully sensible. After passing a dreadful period of anxiety, we heard the cheerful cry of "day-break." I immediately moved my almost disabled limbs and emerged from the covering. The snow had ceased to descend and the wind had greatly moderated, but the scene that presented itself was disheartening and appalling! Our vessel was an entire wreck; the decks were swept fore and aft of every moveable article, and the sea was making a free passage over them. While alternately gazing on this spectacle of desolation, and watching with eager gaze the horizon, already tinged with the ruddy precursors of the coming day, the joyful cry of "a sail on the starboard bow!" broke upon my ear; a shout of ecstasy burst from the ship's crew, and a flood of grateful tears was the only effort which nature allowed me to testify the rapture which the intelligence produced. I crawled back to my enfeebled companions; they had heard the joyous shout, and were clasping each other in all the fond endearments of pure and renovated affection. Mrs. S. sobbed forth her thanks to me with the eloquence of a grateful heart, which more than overpaid the exertions I had used in her behalf. Our anxiety was now directed to the promised deliverance; we could easily distinguish the vessel was rapidly gaining on us, and I saw that our crew had contrived to hoist several signals to attract attention. This was a period of painful solicitude—every eye was strained in the direction of the expected succour—every heart beat high with contending emotions of hope and fear. At length our anxieties were partially relieved, a flag was hoisted by the approaching vessel, a thick smoke proceeded from her side, a flash followed, and the loud report of a cannon was borne to our delighted ears—all proofs that our hapless situation had been observed. In a few moments we saw a boat lanced and speeding to our relief; a shout of exultation burst from every lip. The crew were almost maddened with joy, and I observed the mild eyes of Mrs. S. lifted in grateful thankfulness to heaven for the unexpected deliverance which had been afforded us. The boat was rapidly nearing our now almost sinking vessel. Captain J. was busied in making the necessary arrangements for our departure, and it was decided that Mrs. S. and her husband should be among the first to leave the ship, a privilege that was readily acceded to them by all hands. The boat was now within hail; a rope was eagerly thrown out and caught by our deliverers; they had sent the ship's long-boat, which was found to be sufficiently large to accommodate the whole of our surviving crew, with the passengers. In a few minutes we were safely placed in her, and a short time brought us to the vessel. She proved to be a fine ship bound to Liverpool, from Quebec; she had weathered the storm in the shelter of Gaspé Bay, and with the full approach of day, had taken advantage of the fair breeze to prosecute her voyage. We experienced the kindest attentions from the captain. A comfortable bed and warm restoratives were quickly afforded to Mrs. S., who soon recovered. In the evening of the same day on which we were so providentially saved, she joined our thankful party, and united in grateful expressions of praise to the Divine Being who had rescued us from impending death. Our subsequent voyage passed without any further incident, and we reached Liverpool after a quick passage of three weeks. D.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

MOVING PANORAMA.

"It is remarkable," says Dr. Arnott, "when the imagination is once excited by some beautiful or striking view, how readily any visual hint produces clear and strong impressions. One day in the cosmorama a school-boy visiter exclaimed, that he saw a monstrous tiger coming from its den among the rocks—it was a kitten belonging to the attendant, which by accident had strayed among the paintings. And another young spectator was heard calling that he saw a horse galloping up the mountain side—it was a minute fly crawling slowly along the canvass. There is in this department a very fine field yet open to the exercise of ingenuity, for the contemplation of pictures representing motion or progressive events, may be made the occasion of mental excitement the most varied and intense. For instance, there are few scenes on earth calculated to awaken more interesting reflections on the condition of human nature than that beheld by a person who sails along the river Thames from London to the sea, a distance of about forty miles, through the wonders which on every side there crowd on the sight—the forest of ships from all parts of the world—the glorious monuments of industry, of philanthropy, of science—the marks of the riches, the high civilization, and the happiness of the people. Now this scene was last year in one of our theatres strikingly portrayed, by what was called a moving panorama of the southern bank of the Thames. It was a very long painting, of which a part only was seen at a time gliding slowly across the stage, and the impression made on the spectators was that of their viewing the realities while going down the river in a steam-boat. In the same manner the whole coast of Britain might be most interestingly represented—or any other coast, or any line of road, or even a line of balloon flight. There was another moving panorama exhibited about the same time at Spring Gardens, aiming at an object of still greater difficulty, viz. to depict a course of human life; and the history chosen was that of the latter part of Bonaparte's career. Scenes representing the principal events were, in succession, and apparently on the same canvases, made to glide across the field of view, so designed that the real motion of the picture gave to the spectator the feeling of the events being only then in progress, and with the accompaniments of clear narration and suitable music, they produced on those who viewed them the most complete illusion. The story began with the blow struck at Bonaparte's ambition in the battle of Trafalgar; and, to mark how completely, by representations of various moments and situations of the battle, the spectators were, in imagination, made present to it, the author of this work may mention, that on the occasion of his visiting the exhibition, a young man, seeing a party of British preparing to board an enemy's ship, started from his seat with a hurrah! and seemed quite surprised when he found that he was not really in the battle. To the first views there succeeded many others, similarly introduced and explained, in each of which the hero himself appeared; there were, his defeat at Waterloo—his subsequent flight—his delivery of himself to the British admiral—his appearing at the gangway of the Bellerophon to thousands of spectators, waiting in boats around, while he was in Plymouth harbour, previous to his departure for ever from the shores of Europe—his house and habits during his exile, with various views of St. Helena—and last of all, that solemn procession, in which the bier, with his lifeless corpse, appeared moving slowly on its way to the grave under the willow-tree. The exhibition now spoken of might have been made much better in all respects, yet in its mediocrity it served to prove how admirably adapted such unions of painting, music, and narration, or poetry, are to affect the mind, and therefore to become the means of conveying most impressive lessons of historical fact and moral principle." Arnot's Physics.

BAD COMPANY.

All experience confirms the general remark of the heathen poet, quoted by a christian apostle, that "evil communication corrupts good manners." It is sure to operate on the soul, as poison operates on the body, with more or less malignity as its composition is more or less subtle or potent. The person lives not at any age, least of all at that when the mind is known to be most susceptible, who can avoid taking a tincture from those with whom he mingles, not, as we hinted before, transiently and through necessity, but habitually and from choice. "He that walketh with wise men shall be wise; but a companion of fools shall be destroyed," said the deepest observer of life that ever existed among the sons of Adam. With what unequalled emphasis has he cautioned young men against the first approaches to familiarity with the bad! I say the first approaches, well knowing with what restless and increasing rapidity those are drawn in, who venture but to touch on that dreadful whirlpool. Would to heaven his words were engraved on your hearts, in characters which no time and no temptation should have power to efface!—"Enter not into the path of the wicked, and go not in the way of evil men. Avoid it; pass by it; turn from it, and pass away;"—were the several ideas that rose above each other with a beautiful gradation, and they form altogether one of the most pointed and awakening exhibitions that could fall from the pen of wisdom. No; there is not in all her school a lesson of more importance, than that of shunning even the remotest tendencies to unnecessary association, or what is commonly termed friendship, with unprincipled men; in which number we do not comprehend only the debauched, the openly impious, or the scandalously profane, but the dissipated too; yea, the dissipated in the least criminal acceptation of the word, or those who, on a competition between duty and amusement, are accustomed to prefer the latter; transgressing, or forgetting, or superficially performing the former for the sake of enjoying more freely their light and airy pleasures. Fordyce.

A FACT.

Upwards of fifty years ago, the present Dr. —, of London, a highly respected clergyman, and his sister, Mrs. D—, at that time about seventeen and fifteen years of age, respectively, were travelling in Devonshire with their father, and arrived one day at a small inn on the road, at which they stopped to dine, but the afternoon becoming very wet and stormy, they resolved to remain all night; and, having intimated this to the landlord, he retired to make the necessary arrangements. Shortly after he returned to the room in which the party were seated, and making his obeisance, remarked, with a very complacent and self-satisfied smile, that, as the afternoon was so wet, and necessarily prevented any out-door excursion, if the young lady would find any amusement in looking over portfolio of original drawings, he would desire his son to wait upon them, and exhibit his attainments in the fine arts. This intimation was of course joyfully received, especially by the young lady, who was a considerable proficient in drawing, and in a few minutes a tall raw-boned lad, of about seventeen years of age, entered the room with a portfolio under his arm, which he proceeded to open and unfold to their view a considerable number of original pencil and chalk drawings, which he seemed very proud of, but which appeared to the party to be any thing rather than beautiful specimens of this delightful art. After this examination had closed, the young artist, conscious, we presume, of his powers, requested the young lady to sit for her portrait in chalk, which, for her amusement, she consented to; the artist commenced his task, and in the progress of it, so often turned his large expressive eye in eager gazings on the interesting countenance of the fair sister, that she felt much difficulty in restraining herself from a burst of laughter. The portrait was finished in about half an hour, and presented to the original, who, although at that time she could not help smiling at the rude attempt, still has it in her possession, and would not now part with it for money, this sketch being produced by the late highly-gifted and now deeply lamented Thomas Lawrence, president of the Royal Academy, and portrait painter to his majesty. Eng. paper.

FLATTERY REWARDED.

Frederick William, father of Frederick the Great of Prussia, painted, or fancied he painted, but his works were mere daubs. Such, however, was not the language of his courtiers, when decanting on the merits of the royal Appelles. On one occasion his majesty favoured them with the sight of a new specimen. "Suppose," said the king, "that some great painter, Rubens or Raphael, for instance, had painted this picture; do you think it would fetch a considerable price?" "Sire," replied the Baron de Polnitz, who passed for the most practised and the most obsequious of his majesty's courtiers, "I assure you that a connoisseur could not offer less for such a picture than twenty-five thousand florins." "Well, then, baron," cried the gratified monarch, "you shall receive a proof of my munificence; take the picture for five thousand florins, which you shall pay me in ready money; and, as I wish to render you a service, you have my permission to sell it again." "Ah, sire," cried the baron, who was fairly caught in his own snare, "I can never consent to take advantage of your majesty's generosity." "No reply," said the king; "I know that I make you a handsome present, by which you will gain fifteen thousand florins or more. But your zeal for my interest has been proved, and I owe you some recompense. Your love for the arts, and your attachment to my person, entitle you to this mark of my esteem." Ibid.

THE CLOSING OF LIFE.

Of all the periods and events of life the concluding scene is one of the deepest interest to the person himself, and to surviving spectators. Various are the ways in which it comes, and various the aspects it presents; but in all it is solemn. What can be more so than the approach of that moment, which to the dying man is the boundary between time and eternity! which concludes the one and commences the other; which terminates all his interests in this world, and fixes his condition for a never-ending existence in the world unknown? What can be more so than those moments of silent and indescribable anxiety, when the last sands of the numbered hour are running; when the beat of the heart has become too languid to be felt at the extremities of the frame; when the hand returns not the gentle pressure; when the limb lies stiff and motionless; when the eye is fixed, and the ear turns no more towards the voice of consoling kindness; when the breath, before oppressive and laborious, becomes feebler and feebler till it dies slowly away—and to the listening ear there is no sound amidst the breathless silence; nor to the arrested eye, that watches with the unmoving look of thrilling solicitude for the last symptom of remaining life, is motion longer perceptible, when surrounding friends continue to speak in whispers, and to step through the chamber on the tiptoe of cautiousness, as if still fearful of disturbing him—whom the noise of a thousand thunders could not now startle—who has fallen into that last sleep, from which nothing shall rouse him but "the voice of the archangel and the trump of God!" Wardlaw.

INTEMPERANCE.

"I saw him carried out of his dwelling. The coffin was large, for he was a manly youth. On it were the initials of his name—H. C. aged 25. His widow followed him, beautiful in grief. She was twenty-two. When I joined their hands, I saw that his wife was a young girl, and his mother a young woman."

It was a sad slaughter. Intemperance did it. I knew it. All knew it. Many sighed deeply as they laid him in the grave and thought it was so. I wanted to say it was. I spoke long at the house, and again at the grave, and of every thing but his destroyer. The fire burned in my bosom, and I wished to attack him over the lifeless body, and warn the young men of my charge to beware of his wiles. But all would have pronounced it imprudent; unkind to friends, and unsuitable to the occasion, and I was compelled to be silent. And thus, thought I, it is. The demon intemperance can slay our young men, and none can mutter. The cause of their death must be hushed up. It must be ascribed to every thing but the reality. C., it was said, died of the consumption, and the demon laughed every time the lie was told." A Pastor's Jour.

PINE TREE.

Mr. David Douglass, a practical botanist, who but very recently returned from an exploratory tour to the west coast of North America, has communicated to the Horticultural Society of London, riches hitherto unknown in the products of the vegetable kingdom. Among them we find two new species of pine, of more gigantic dimensions than any hitherto described in Europe or America. One species (Pinus Douglasii) grows to the height of two hundred and thirty feet, and is upwards of fifty feet in circumference at its base. It is stated to have a rough corky bark, from one inch to twelve inches thick. The leaves resemble those of the spruce, and the cones are small. The timber is heavy and of good quality. It was found growing on the banks of the Columbia, where it forms extensive forests, extending from the shore of the Pacific to the Stony Mountains. The other species (Pinus Lambertiana) was discovered in northern California, where it is dispersed over large tracts of country. It is a most majestic tree. One specimen, which in consequence of its having been blown down, Mr. Douglass was enabled to measure, was two hundred and fifteen feet in length, fifty-seven feet nine inches in circumference at three feet from the root, and seventeen feet five inches at one hundred and thirty-four feet. It is thought to be the largest mass of timber ever measured by man; and yet some of the growing specimens of the same pine were evidently of greater elevation. A singular property of this tree is, that when the timber is partly burned, the turpentine loses its flavour and assumes a sweetish taste. It is used by the natives as a substitute for sugar. Dr. Francis.

EDITORS.

An editor, desirous of leading a quiet and easy life, must adopt one of two courses; either to express no opinion whatever upon public men or public measures, or to unite himself firmly with a party, and utter the opinions which they adopt, and no other. By the first mode he will offend no one; and by the other, he will be sure of pleasing the party to which he has attached himself. If that party be a minority so much the better, his task will be lightened one-half. It is easier to rail than to reason. A distinguished British statesman once said, that he found the business of opposition easy enough; it was only when he got into power that he was at a loss how to proceed. But the cant of a ruling party, though not quite so manageable as the other, is very easily acquired, and many dull scholars have made great proficiency in it. Nat. Gazette.

A HUMOROUS FELLOW.

A carpenter, being subpoenaed as a witness on a trial of assault, one of the counsel, who was very much given to browbeating the evidence, asked him what distance he was from the parties when he saw the defendant striking the plaintiff? The carpenter answered, "Just four feet five inches and a half." "Prithce, fellow," said the counsel, "how is it possible you can be so very exact as to the distance?" "Why, to tell the truth," said the carpenter, "I thought perhaps some fool might ask me, and so I measured it." Scotsman.

IN SPITE OF HIS TEETH.

King John once demanded of a certain Jew ten thousand marks; on refusal of which, he ordered one of the Israelite's teeth to be drawn every day till he should consent. The Jew lost seven, and then paid the required sum. Hence the phrase, "In spite of his teeth." Ibid.

ROSE, THISTLE, AND SHAMROCK.

It is a singular circumstance that Moore, who is an Irishman, should write the life of Lord Byron, who is an Englishman, and dedicate the work to Sir Walter Scott, who is a Scotchman. Ibid.

An Irishman went into a cooper's shop, and asked for an

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

THE RAMBLER.—NUMBER XIII.

EDITORIAL COURTESIES.

"I must speak in a passion, and I will do it in King Cymboes' vein."—Shakspeare.

If Socrates, or any other sensible ancient, could be resuscitated, and have half-a-dozen flaming rhapsodies on the benefits and blessings of the "press," put into his hands, what a glorious and mighty change would he suppose had taken place in the ordering of public affairs, since the time when the Athenian rabble were led by the nose by every noisy demagogue who chose to spout nonsense to them in their market-places. How the good man's heart would be filled with rejoicing as he read glowing descriptions of the tremendous capabilities of this mighty engine, wielded solely for the benefit of mankind, and of its unwearied exertions to disseminate useful information and correct knowledge of political events to the meanest citizen of the state! He would suppose, that with this almost omnipotent power arrayed on the side of virtue, and watching with untiring vigilance over the true interests of all, that this wicked world must have been transformed into a sort of Utopia since his time—a place from which all prejudice, venality, corruption, and sycophancy were swept away, and where the governors and the governed would emulate each other in their exertions for the common weal. But if, after perusing the aforesaid rhapsodies, the said Socrates could have a quantity of newspapers taken indiscriminately from different parts of the country placed before him, there is strong reason to believe that an attentive perusal of their elegant contents would materially change his opinion. He would find the gentlemen presiding over one-half of the press stating that the other portion of their editorial brethren were, without exception, the greatest set of rascals, scoundrels, rogues, thieves, and vagabonds that ever existed on the face of the earth; and that they were the most vile, the most degraded, the most contemptible miscreants that could, by any possibility, disgrace humanity. On the other hand, he would find the party accused in these gentle terms, asserting that their assailants were well known to be such infamous liars, so totally destitute of every spark of honesty, so stained with infamy, so branded with convicted falsehoods, as to render any thing they might say unworthy of the slightest notice. Poor Socrates would be sadly puzzled, and think there was more in this than he ever "dreamt of in his philosophy;" and that truth still kept her ancient station at the bottom of a well. He would find these virtuous vehicles of knowledge and information made up of quack advertisements, dreadful murders, dreadful poetry, Joe Miller jests and editorial personalities; in the latter of which he would see all the coarseness of his old enemy Aristophanes ten times trebled, without a single redeeming sprinkling of his wit and humour, and he would be lost in utter amazement to find that the very worst and most ignorant portion of the people (according to their own showing) had been, by some strange fatality, elevated to instruct and amuse the rest.

There are some subjects which it is necessary to aid by a slight stretch of the fancy, or a little exaggeration of language, in order to give them point and effect; but to describe, just as it is, the manner in which editorial warfare is carried on in the country papers of the United States, other words than what are to be found in Walker or Webster must be sought for; they are too tame, too weak to convey any idea of these Billingsgate personalities.

"A beggar in his drink
Would not bestow such terms upon his callet," as the worthy conductors of the press think proper to bestow upon each other. Wherein the utility—the advantage of all this to the public, or what is more, to themselves, consists, is not easy to discover. If they are what they say they are, would it not be their policy to agree and keep it concealed, and not blazon forth each other's infamy to the world? And what has that world to do with their disreputable quarrels and low abuse, farther than to laugh at and despise them for it? the public of this day, as of yore,

"care not a toss up
Whether Mossop kick Barry or Barry kick Mossop," and after looking on for some time, and amusing itself with the noise and sputter of the enraged belligerents, come to the conclusion that they are both contemptible creatures, and pay no further attention to the matter. In fact, nine-tenths of the papers have, by this degrading conduct, in a great measure lost the power of affecting character either by praise or censure: there are many who pay no sort of attention either to what they say of public men or of each other; and if there are still those who, making a deduction of ninety-nine per cent., think "there must be some truth in what the fellow says," their number is fast diminishing. A paper is at present lying before us, from which better things might have been expected, as it is published in a decent neighbourhood, and contains some good reading matter, in which, amid two-thirds of a column of abuse, one of the most moderate sentences is, that his opponent is "a liar by nature and a thief by profession." After going on for some time with unabated spirit in this strain of unmitigated abuse, he winds up with the following magnificent piece of composition. "If the river Amazon were made to run through his (his opponent's) soul, more time would be taken up in cleansing it of its depravity and filthiness than was required by the ancient river to cleanse the celebrated stables, wherein a thousand oxen had been stalled for almost as many years!" This appears to be only one of a series of articles on the subject! and the offence, as far as we can make it out, for which all these hard words are let loose, seems to have been the copying a paragraph without due credit, or something of the kind of equally vital importance to the community. We have not seen the replication to this choice morceau, but presume it will be in the same style of impassioned and elegant invective.

Now is not this and such as this abominable? and hundreds of instances could be pointed out of still greater magnitude, in which the personal appearance and family connexions of a man are ridiculed—charges of not having paid his tailor's bill, or any thing else, no matter what, that depravity can invent or blackguardism utter, are put forth. Opprobrious epithets from such sources, when applied to those who have been long before the public, and whose characters are well and favourably known, can do but comparatively little harm; they may exclaim with Brutus,

"I am armed so strong in honesty
That they pass by me as the idle wind,
Which I regard not;"

but suppose an honourable and sensitive man, just commencing his career, attacked by one of those literary scavengers, what exquisite pain must it give him to find himself dragged forward and slandered in this manner. And he has no redress; he cannot reply, or at all events if he does, it will be a most unequal match, for he will be temperate in his language, and anxious not to assert any thing but what is strictly true. It would be like a gentleman neatly dressed in light-coloured unmentionables and white kid gloves, engaged in a combat of throwing mud from a kennel with a ragged and tattered miscreant; his adversary, from being well practised at the game, throws ten handfull of dirt for his one, and quickly bespatters him all over, while the few additional pieces that he could send would never be discerned on his opponent's already soiled and filthy garments. The best way certainly for all those who are well enough known to afford it, is to pass all such attacks over in absolute silence. Blackwood's Magazine, whose personality has at least always prostituted humour and ability to make it go off, has never been so enraged by any of the retorts of its adversaries as by the real or affected contempt of the Edinburgh Review. Notwithstanding the virulent abuse that has from time to time been bestowed upon it, the Edinburgh has never, since the commencement of Blackwood, let it appear that it was conscious there was such a journal in existence.

We are not very sanguine in anticipations of any speedy and effectual change for the better in this world of ours; but we do think the time is fast coming when, with a few exceptions, the present race of public journals in the United States will be regarded with unqualified contempt. There are already symptoms of better things. Most of the city papers in New-York, and indeed in all large towns, have lately amended their ways considerably in this respect, though they were never one quarter so bad as their rural brethren; and there are several journals that are respectable and entertaining repositories of news, knowledge, literature, and fashion, while their trifling disputes are conducted in a pleasant and gentlemanly spirit. Clashing interests and party views will always preserve some portion of personality in the world; but it would be more agreeable to all concerned to settle their little affairs of the pen by good-natured railery, light repartees, and polished sarcasms, such as pass in decent society, in preference to vulgar slang and porter-house figures of rhetoric. Let such contests be carried on like two gentlemen engaged in a bout at foils, in which both exert their utmost skill and ingenuity, in a friendly temper; and when a "palpable hit" is given on either side, let it be courteously acknowledged, and then try it again; and not like a couple of ragamuffins in the street, who fight and tear themselves to pieces for the amusement of the spectators.

From ill air we take disease; from ill company vices and imperfections.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

PORTRAITS OF CELEBRATED CHARACTERS.

PRINCE HOHENLOHE.

THE prevalence of superstition and fanaticism which still exist in the world, notwithstanding all the boasting of the present enlightened state of society, is a subject for reflection at once astonishing and humiliating. It certainly affords matter for surprise that in the nineteenth century there should arise individuals who seek to revive in their own persons all the incredible fictions and gross impositions practised during what is termed the "dark ages;" and it is no less humiliating to human nature to find thousands of credulous believers in these pretended possessors of divine inspiration and supernatural powers.

Among those who have lately taxed human credulity, the subject of our present sketch stands pre-eminently conspicuous. The miraculous power he has claimed of being able to cure diseases, however distant he may be separated from the objects who solicit his assistance, long rendered him an universal subject of conversation, and we trust will plead a sufficient cause for introducing him among our list of celebrated characters.

Prince Alexander Hohenlohe is descended from one of the oldest families in Germany. His ancestors were among the first to embrace the reformed religion, but returned to the catholic church in 1667. In 1744 the houses of Hohenlohe were elevated to the rank of princes of the holy Roman empire. They are divided into two reigning families or houses; those of Nevenstein and of Waldenburg, to the latter of which Prince Hohenlohe belongs. He is one of the canons of Olmutz, and a knight of Malta.

It appears from his biographer, father Baur, that it was not until the year 1821 that the prince gave any indication of possessing the extraordinary powers he then laid claim to. Being at Wurzburg at that period (1821,) he frequently preached and celebrated high mass, in the ordinary routine of his official duties as a dignitary of the catholic church. In the spring of that year he first commenced the performance of miraculous cures. He is described at this period as making the blind to see, the deaf to hear, and the lame to walk; of the entire truth of these statements no certain evidence can be given. It is well known, however, to those at all conversant with medical subjects, that the imagination strongly acted upon, is capable of producing temporary, and in some cases perfect cures, in many diseases incident to the human species. A knowledge of this fact may perhaps satisfactorily explain most of the wonderful miracles attributed to this extraordinary man. Following his biographer, we find that on the twenty-seventh of June, subsequent to his commencing his wonderful mission, that thirty-six individuals had been cured, and that on the following day the number was increased to sixty, among whom was the princess of Schwartzberg, who had been lame from her eighth to her seventeenth year. This lady is represented as being entirely cured by the prayers of Prince Hohenlohe. The reigning prince of Bavaria, who was deaf, was also restored to his hearing—the sight of a Madame Polzano was recovered, after many years suffering under an entire extinction of that faculty. These miraculous doings in a catholic country, very naturally produced great excitement and wonder, and the house of the prince was surrounded by thousands, from town and country who implored his interposition on their behalf. It is needless to say that only a small portion of these received the expected aid—a strong proof of the absence of any real power of this self-inspired apostle. The fame of the prince had now spread over the continent, and we find him visiting various places, in all of which he is stated to have left proofs of his healing powers. On his return to Wurzburg crowds of eager applicants awaited his return, and numerous cures are related to have been performed, one of which we will narrate, as exhibiting the extraordinary effect produced on the people generally by these pretended miracles. Shortly after the prince's arrival at Wurzburg a chaise drove up to the hotel in which he was residing, and it was immediately ascertained by the assembled crowd, that it brought some poor creature in need of help, and actually an old man, by trade a butcher, was carried out of it in sheets into the hotel, for all his members appeared so crippled that he could not be touched with hands. Many of the multitude exclaimed aloud, "If this man is cured the finger of God will be manifest;" and all were full of expectation for the event. After some time a lady was heard in the hotel calling out of the window to those in the balcony of the adjoining house, "Good heavens! the man is cured! he can walk!" The crowd below were now more eager with expectation, when another lady called out to them, "Clear the way before the door, the man is coming out!" The man now made his appearance and walked to the chaise, the mob shouting an exulting pean to the honour of their successful apostle. The man after driving a little way stopped the coachman, desiring him to take him back to the prince, as through excessive joy he had forgotten to return him thanks.

The miracles of the prince do not stop here, and it would far exceed our limits to chronicle them—neither time nor distance presented any obstacle to his wonder-working powers. He now established a certain day and hour wherein he would effect cures in any part of the world by the parties who desired his aid, joining him in prayer at these specified periods, and by placing an entire confidence in his abilities to cure them, they were to be restored. Many cases are cited by his followers of extraordinary cures having been performed by these means, which have drawn the attention of able and experienced men in the medical profession, who have examined the proofs exhibited in such cases; and the result of their labours has been a thorough conviction that imagination, acting upon credulous minds, has worked these pretended miracles.

The prince has lately ceased his labours, induced, perhaps, by the exposure of some of his assumed claims for divine inspiration. His popularity has also decreased with this relinquishment of his miraculous powers, for a short time since the public papers announced that one of the petty sovereigns of Germany had interdicted him from visiting the territory over which he presided.

Such is a brief account of this modern apostle, in the extravagance of which it is difficult to determine whether the presumption of the prince, or the credulity of his followers is the most preposterous. H.*

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

NATURE.

To him who, in the love of nature, holds
Communion with her visible forms, she speaks
A various language.—Bryant.

THE carelessness with which most persons regard natural objects has often afforded matter for reflection to the philosophic mind. To one who is accustomed to look at nature with a keen and enraptured eye, this indifference to her works seems, at first view, irreconcilable with that innate inquisitiveness so characteristic of mankind. While his own ear is filled with the melody of sweet voices—while his imagination catches the living echoes of that anthem which the morning stars sang at creation's birth; and while his soul expands as it expatiates amid the bright and varied scenes of this charming world, his brother's insensibility is to him a mystery. Every fibre in his own bosom is thrilling with delight as he looks abroad over the fair earth; joyous and stirring perceptions come thronging upon his mind; new and beautiful analogies are charming his fancy—but why is his brother unmoved? Is the power of sensation palsied, or are the heart-springs of gladness dried up within him? O no; but the spell of ignorance is upon him; he has not yet been initiated into the mysteries of creation.

The effects of this spell are confined principally to the great mass of the low and indigent. The wants attendant on their humble condition must necessarily engross their chief attention, and consequently very little time is left for the acquisition of that knowledge which does not immediately tend to the removal of those wants. If nature is bountiful, they are satisfied with her gifts, without investigating the wonderful economy by which they are furnished. They are ignorant, in fact, of any such economy. The forms that spring up around them present nothing particularly curious or interesting to their view. They regard them as mere simple objects, not being aware that the most delicate mechanism and the most complex combination of elements obtain throughout their minutest parts. The novelty of strange and uncommon structures that frequently interrupt the falsely-termed monotony of natural objects, or the plumage and note of an unknown bird, may for a moment elicit their attention and admiration; but the duration and degree are far inferior to that which is excited by a raree-show. Here vulgar curiosity has its richest banquet; it finds a cabinet of wonders in the veriest gewgaws of human ingenuity—the bead and the bracelet, the spangle and the ribbon.

With this taste and under this obscurance of intellect, the rustic goes forth amidst the scenes of nature, in a measure unconscious of the living beauty that emanates from every object around him. The decorations of air and earth are to him charmless, mere blanks; while he plods on, treading down the flowers, prostrating the forests, drowning with some uncouth strain the music of woods and waters, and shutting his eye on the visible glories of creation with the most listless apathy. But should philosophy, the sage expositor of nature's truths, in whose hands is the key to her temple, remove the mist that is upon his vision, and enlighten him in the wonders of her operations, think you he would then remain as indifferent as before? As well might we suppose the blind man would continue insensible to the light, and the loveliness of material forms, were his eyes divested of their cata-racts. Explain to the school-boy the inimitable conformation of the bird, or the butterfly which flutters in his grasp—the relative adaptations of the organs of that tiny frame to symmetry, elegance of movement, and sustentation of life, and he will slacken his careless hold, and gaze on the little prisoner with an admiration he never before experienced. At the same time, there will be a kind of awe mingled with his delight, when he discovers that he has been rudely handling the delicate work of a mysterious power, abounding with beauty and ingenuity—the work of a superior intelligence. Teach the untutored peasant also the phenomena of the vegetable system, unfold to his comprehension its absorbents and exhalents, its resources for the continuation of the species, and the chemical processes which give to the autumn forests their gorgeous colourings, and you open a new world to his astonished and delighted mind.

Now and then one of this benighted class breaks from the thralldom of ignorance, and dashing away the shackles and the scales that bound and blinded him, sweeps forth like the eagle to gaze with undazzled eye on the brightest irradiations of created things. Him poverty cannot re-fetter, or necessity subdue. The thirst after the hidden fountains of knowledge is in his soul—the charm of curiosity impels him forward, and who shall stay him in his career? Who let fall the curtain of oblivion between his searching vision and the far-stretching and glorious prospects to which he has been introduced? He feels that the link in the chain of existences which connects him with the brute is lengthened, as the dominions of mind are extended, and the reach of thought approximates to the central and all-perfect intellect of the universe. Then swell the high aspirations for a still purer and more exalted state of being as revelation after revelation is unfolded, until they become, as it were, a part of his existence—a well-spring of hope, joy, and solace, for ever gushing up fresh and full in his bosom. If indigence require him to toil for sustenance, he goes cheerfully to his task, for his labours are among the objects of his admiration. The melody of birds, brooks, and branches is in his ear, while his eye is filled with the fair presentations of ever-varying landscapes. As he plies the axe or the sickle, fancy is busied with her enchantments, and imagination, as she passes her fairy creations before his mind, divests labour of half its weariness. In the forest or the field the muses are his companions, and their inspiration is not unfrequently bodied forth in many a care-dispelling song. In the lonely and retired glens of the mountains he is not alone, for nature is with him; and in the hush of their awful solitudes he hears her deep voice, and bears himself reverently as in the sphere of some august presence. Every season and every clime have charms for him. The alternations of light and darkness, tempest and calm, all seasons and all places, are teeming with interest. He becomes the adopted of nature, and is admitted to her most intimate familiarity. His mind seizes upon her truths as by the power of intuition, and he looks through the mysteries of her operations with the perspicacity of a higher intelligence. His countenance exhibits not the slightest trace of that stupid indifference to her charms which originates in ignorance, and characterises the vacant mien of the multitude; but its every lineament is instinct with a noble and joyous expression. Such were Shakspeare and Burns, men of humble birth, who, unacquainted with classic lore and the accumulated treasures of philosophy, scanned nature with an accuracy of perception, depth of comprehension, and ardency of love, unsurpassed by that of the most favoured votaries of science. She presented herself before them in her unrobed loveliness, and they needed not the teachings of the schools to portray to the life the graces and the glories of their divinity. They were guided by a greater than all human masters—the power of an inborn and infallible taste. But such instances are rare. The generality of mankind, including many of the rich and the learned, pass on through life encircled by beautiful things and yet ignorant of their beauties, and unsusceptible of those pure and ennobling pleasures that spring from a knowledge of the charms which nature has lavished around them.

PROTEUS.

Poverty whets the genius—opulence blunts it. When the stomach is empty, the body becomes all spirit—when full, the spirit becomes all body.

THE SPANISH ARMADA.

THIS far-famed but unsuccessful expedition against England, during the reign of Elizabeth, has proved a prolific theme for the historian, the novelist, and the dramatist. The well-known motto "Affavit Deus, et dissipantur," took its rise from this occasion, being impressed on the medal which was struck by order of Elizabeth, in commemoration of the dispersion of this formidable squadron. In English, "The breath of God has issued, and they are dispersed." Perhaps a few particulars of this important event may not be uninteresting to the readers of the New-York Mirror.

The celebrated English navigator, Drake, (the history of whose voyages and successful depredations on the Spanish possessions, has sharpened the innate cupidity of many a school-boy, and probably made more sailors than even the romance of Robinson Crusoe itself,) was about that time, 1587, in all his glory, at the very acmé of his successful career. While the king of Spain, Philip II., was secretly meditating his great design against England, and had actually commenced his preparations, the daring Drake destroyed a whole fleet of transports at Cadiz, laden with ammunition and naval stores. He also ravaged the western coast, insulted Lisbon, and took a rich carrack, laden with treasure and papers of great importance. By this short expedition, the means of which had been furnished by the London merchants, the naval preparations of Spain were disconcerted, the proposed expedition against England was retarded twelve months, and the queen had leisure to take more secure measures against that formidable invasion.

Cavendish had also, in the same year, committed great depredations on the Spaniards in the South Sea; having taken many vessels richly laden. On his return to England, he entered the river Thames in a kind of triumph, the style of which, however, betrayed a little of the coxcomb. His mariners and soldiers were clothed in silk, his sails were of damask, and his topsail cloth-of-gold! And well could he afford such extravagance, for his prizes were the richest that had ever been brought into England.

Provoked by these hostilities on the part of Elizabeth, Philip had for a considerable time, and very naturally too, harboured a secret and violent desire of revenge. The period which he had chosen for this purpose was peculiarly favourable to his design, as a truce had been lately concluded with the Turks; and France, at that time the perpetual rival of Spain, was so distracted with intestine commotions, that no obstacle was to be apprehended from that quarter.

Philip's preparations had been, for some time, conducted with studied secrecy and reserve; but no sooner was his resolution fully formed, than every part of his extensive empire resounded with the noise of armaments. All his ministers, generals, and admirals, were employed in forwarding the design. Accordingly the plans were laid and measures were taken in all the ports of Sicily, Naples, Spain, and Portugal, for fitting out such a fleet and embarkation as had never before had its equal in Europe. The Spaniards, ostentatious of their power, and clothed with vain hope, had already denominated their navy the "invincible armada." Superstition, too, added her fanatic but powerful aid. Papal bulls, denouncing perdition to Elizabeth and her abettors, accompanied the squadron; and a consecrated banner from Rome waved over the heads of these new crusaders. The grand and ultimate object of the whole expedition was the overthrow of the protestant religion in England, and the re-uniting the whole christian world in the catholic communion.

On the twenty-ninth of May, 1588, this formidable flotilla, consisting of one hundred and sixty vessels, with about thirty thousand men, including soldiers, mariners, and galley-slaves, the whole under the command of the duke of Medina, set sail from Lisbon. In the mean time an army of fifty-four thousand men was assembled in the Netherlands, and kept in readiness to be transported into England as soon as the invaders had effected a landing. But if omens are to be trusted, the very commencement of the expedition was indicative of its ultimate defeat; for the next day after the fleet left Lisbon it was dispersed by a violent storm, so that some of the smallest ships were sunk, whilst the others took shelter in the Gironde. As soon as the armada was refitted, however, it sailed again towards the English coast, and arrived in the channel on the nineteenth of July. Here it disposed itself in the form of a crescent, extending to the distance of seven miles from the extremity of one division to that of the other.

The English admiral (Lord Howard of Effingham) had just time to get out of port, when he saw the "invincible armada" in full sail; "and yet," says the Italian Bentivoglio, "advancing with a slow motion, as if the ocean groined with supporting, and the winds were tired with impelling so enormous a weight." As the armada proceeded up the channel, Effingham with the English fleet, consisting of one hundred and fifty sail, gave orders to avoid a close fight, but to skirmish with the larger ships of the Spanish fleet, which it continued to do for six days. The armada having reached Calais, cast anchor before that place, to await the arrival of the prince of Parma, who was to join them with a powerful force from the Flemish ports. While they lay rather confusedly in this position, Effingham, by a successful stratagem, despatched eight of his smaller ships filled with combustibles, one after another, into the midst of the enemy, and thus alarmed them to such a degree that they immediately cut their cables and betook themselves to flight with the greatest disorder and precipitation. On the following morning they were attacked by the whole English fleet, who took about a dozen of their largest ships and damaged several others.

Discomfited and disheartened, the Spanish admiral seeing the "invincible armada" in imminent danger of being totally destroyed, prepared to return homeward; but as the wind opposed his passage through the channel, and the English vessels harassed his retreat, he determined to sail northward, and making the tour of the island, to proceed along the Atlantic ocean. The English fleet, however, continued in pursuit, and if their ammunition had not failed them, the whole armada must have been compelled to surrender at discretion; and indeed the duke of Medina was prevented from so doing merely by the advice of his confessor. The event, however, proved almost equally fatal to the Spaniards; a violent tempest arose after they had passed the Orkneys, and the mariners, unable to govern their unwieldy ships, yielded to the fury of the storm, and allowed their vessels to drive either on the western isles of Scotland, or on the coast of Ireland, where they were miserably wrecked. At length, after the experience of inexpressible humiliation and distress, the shattered fleet, consisting of less than half its number, returned to Spain. The priests who had consecrated the ships, and who had frequently and confidently foretold the infallible success of this holy crusade, perplexed in accounting for its failure, at last discovered that all the calamities of the Spaniards had proceeded from their allowing the infidel Moors to live among them! Not so the virgin queen of England. She attributed the event to the right source, and in testimony of her gratitude caused a medal to be struck with an inscription expressive of that sentiment—"Afflavit Deus, et dissipantur." W.

SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN JOURNALS.

APRIL.

BY MISS MARY RUSSEL MITFORD.

"No joyless forms shall regulate
Our living calendar:
We from to-day, my friend, will date
The opening of the year."

"Love, now an universal birth,
From heart to heart is stealing
From earth to man, from man to earth."

APRIL is come—"proud—pied April"—and "hath put a spirit of youth in every thing." Shall our portrait of her, then, alone lack that spirit? No—not if words can speak the feelings from which they spring. "Spring!" See how the name comes uncalled for—as if to hint that it should have stood in the place of "April!" But April is spring—the only spring month that we possess in this egregious climate of ours. Let us, then, make the most of it.

April is at once the most juvenile of all the months, and the most feminine, never knowing her own mind for a day together. Fickle as a fond maiden with her first lover; coying it with the young sun till he withdraws his beams from her, and then weeping till she gets them back again. High-fantastical as the seething wit of a poet, that sees a world of beauty growing beneath his hand, and fancies that he has created it; whereas, it is it has created him a poet: for it is nature that makes April, not April nature. April is, doubtless, the sweetest month of all the year; partly because it ushers in the May, and partly for its own sake—so far as any thing can be valuable without reference to any thing else. It is to May and June, what "sweet fifteen," in the age of woman, is to passion-stricken eighteen, and perfect two and twenty. It is to the confirmed summer, what the previous hope of joy is to the full fruition—what the boyish dream of love is to love itself. It is, indeed, the month of promises; and what are twenty performances compared with one promise? When a promise of delight is fulfilled, it is over and done with; but while it remains a promise, it remains a hope: and what is all good, but the hope of good? What is every to-day of our life, but the hope (or the fear) of to-morrow? April, then, is worth two Mays, because it tells tales of May in every sigh that it breathes, and every tear that it lets fall. It is the harbinger, the herald, the promise, the prophecy, the foretaste of all the beauties that are to follow it—of all, and more—of all the delights of summer, and all the "pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious" autumn. It is fraught with beauties itself that no other month can bring before us, and

"It bears a glass which shows us many more."

As for April herself, her life is one sweet alternation of smiles, and sighs, and tears—and tears, and sighs, and smiles—till it is consummated at last in the open laughter of May. It is like, in short, it is like nothing in the world but "an April day." And her charms—but really I must cease to look upon the face of this fair month generally, lest, like a painter in the presence of his mistress, I grow too enamoured to give a correct resemblance. I must gaze upon her sweet beauties one by one, or I shall never be able to think and treat of her in any other light than that of the spring; which is a mere abstraction, delightful to think of, but, like all other abstractions, not to be depicted or described.

Before I proceed to do this, however, let me inform the reader that what I have hitherto said of April, and may yet have to say, is intended to apply not to this or that April in particular—not to April eighteen hundred and twenty-four, or fourteen, or thirty-four; but to April par excellence—that is to say, what April ("not to speak it profanely") ought to be. In short, I have no intention of being personal in my remarks; and if the April which I am describing should happen to differ, in any essential particulars from the one in whose presence I am describing it, neither the month nor the reader must regard this as a covert libel or satire. The truth is, that, for what reason I know not—whether to put to shame the predictions of the Quarterly Reviewers, or to punish us islanders for our manifold follies and iniquities, or from any quarrel, as of old, between Oberon and Titania—but certain it is that, of late

"The seasons alter; hoary-headed frosts
Fall in the fresh lap of the crimson rose;
And on old Hymen's thin and icy crown
An odorous chaplet of sweet summer buds
Is, as in mockery, set; the spring, the summer,
The chilling autumn, angry winter, change
Their wonted liveries; and the amazed world,
By their increase, now knows not which is which."

It is of April, then, as she is when nature is in her happiest mood, that I am now to speak; and we will take her in the prime of her life, and our first place of rendezvous shall be the open fields.

What a sweet flush of new green has started up to the face of this meadow! And the new-born daisies that stud it here and there, give it the look of an emerald sky powdered with snowy stars. In making our way between them to yonder hedge-row, that divides the meadow from the little copse that lines one side of it, let us not take the shortest way, but keep religiously to the little footpath—for the young grass is as yet too tender to bear being trod upon. I have been hitherto very chary of appealing to the poets in these pleasant papers; because they are people that if you give them an inch, even in a span-long essay of this kind, always endeavour to lay hands on the whole of it. They are like the young cuckoos, that if once they get hatched within a nest, always contrive to oust the natural inhabitants. But when the daisy—"la douce Marguerite"—is in question, how can I refrain from pronouncing a blessing on the bard who has, by his sweet praise of this "unassuming common-place of nature," revived that general love for it, which, until lately, was confined to the hearts of "the old poets," and of those young poets of all times, the little children? But I need not do this; for he has his reward already, in the fulfilment of that prophecy with which he closes his address to his darling flower:

"Thy long-lost praise thou shalt regain;
Dear shalt thou be to future men,
As in old time."

See, upon the sloping sides of this bank beneath the hedge-row, what companies of primroses are dedicating their pale beauties to the pleasant breeze that blows over them, and looking as faint withal as if they had senses that could "ache" at the rich sweetness of the hidden violets that are growing here and there among them. The intermediate spots of the bank are now nearly covered from sight by the various green weeds that sprout up every where, and begin to fill the interstices between the lower stems of the hazel, the hawthorn, the sloe, the eglantine, and the woodbine, that unite their friendly arms together above, to form the natural enclosure—that prettiest feature in our English scenery—or at least that which communicates a picturesque beauty to all the rest. Of the above-named shrubs, the hazel, you see, is scarcely as yet in leaf; the scattered leaves of the woodbine, of a dull purplish green, are fully spread; the sloe is in blossom, offering a pretty but scentless imitation of the sweet hawthorn-bloom that is to come next month; this latter is now vigorously putting forth its crisp and delicate filligree-work of tender green, tipped with red; and the eglantine, or wild rose, in all its innocent varieties, is opening its green hands as if to welcome the sun. Entering the little copse which this enclosure separates from the meadows, we shall find, on the ground, all the low and creeping plants pushing forth their various-shaped leaves—stars, fans, blades, fingers, fringes, and a score of other fanciful forms; and some of them bearing flowers. Among these are the wood-anemone, the wood-sorrel, and the star of Bethlehem; also the primrose is to be found here, but not so rich and full-blown as on the open sunny bank. Overhead, and level with our hands and eyes, we find all the young forest trees (except the oak) in a kind of half-dress—like so many village maidens, in their trim bodices, and with their hair in papers. Among these are conspicuous the graceful birch, hanging its head like a half-shamefaced, half-affected damsel; the trim beech, spruce as a village gallant dressed for the fair; the rough-rinded elm, grave and sedate-looking, even in its youth, and already bespeaking the future "green-robed senator of mighty woods." These, with the white-stemmed ash, the alder, the artificial-looking hornbeam, and the as yet bare oak, make up this silent but happy company, who are to stand here on the same spot all their lives, looking upwards to the clouds and the stars, and downwards to the star-like flowers, till we and our posterity (who pride ourselves on our superiority over them) are laid in that earth of which they alone are the true inheritors. But who ever heard of choosing a warm April morning to moralize in? Let us wait till winter for that, and in the mean time pass out of this pleasant little copse, and make our way windingly towards the home garden.

If the garden, like the year, is not now absolutely at its best, it is perhaps better; inasmuch as a pleasant promise but half performed partakes of the best parts of both promise and performance. Now all is neatness and finish—or ought to be; for the weeds have not yet begun to make head—the annual flower seeds are all sown—the divisions and changes among the perennials, and the removings and plantings of the shrubs, have all taken place. The walks, too, have all been turned and freshened, and the turf has begun to receive its regular rollings and mowings. Among the bulbous-rooted perennials, all that were not in flower during the last two months, are so now; and though in March we (somewhat prematurely) took a final leave of the tulip, the hyacinth, the daffodil, the various kinds of narcissus, &c. yet if the season, up to the commencement of this month, has been seasonable, we may encounter them still, if due care has been taken in the planting and tending of them. Indeed the richest and rarest kinds of tulip are scarcely yet in blow. But what we are chiefly to look for now are the fibrous rooted and herbaceous perennials. There is not one of these that has not awoken from its winter dreams, and put on at least the half of its beauty. A few of them venture to display all their attractions at this time, from a wise fear of that dangerous rivalry which they must be content to encounter if they were to wait for a month longer; for a pretty villager might as well hope to gain hearts at Almack's as a demure daisy or a modest polyanthus think to secure its due attention in the presence of the glaring peonies, flaunting roses, and towering lilies of May and midsummer. Among the shrubs that form the enclosing belt of the flower-garden, the lilac is in full leaf, and loaded with its heavy branches of bloom-buds; the common laurel, if it has reached its flowering age, is hanging out its meek modest flowers, preparatory to putting forth its vigorous summer shoots; the larch has on its hairy tufts of pink, stuck here and there among its delicate threads of green. But the great charm of this month, both in the open country and the garden, is undoubtedly the infinite green which pervades it every where, and which we had best gaze our fill at while we may—as it lasts but a little while—changing in a few weeks into an endless variety of shades and tints, that are equivalent to as many different colours. It is this, and the budding forth of every living member of the vegetable world after its long winter death, that in fact constitutes the spring; and the sight of which affects us in the manner it does, from various causes—chiefly moral and associated ones—but one of which is unquestionably physical: I mean the sight of so much tender green, after the eye has been condemned to look for months and months on the mere negation of all colour, which prevails in winter in our climate. The eye feels cheered, cherished, and regaled by this colour, as the tongue does by a quick and pleasant taste, after having long palated nothing but tasteless and insipid things. This is the principal charm of spring, no doubt. But another, and one that is scarcely second to this, is the bright flush of blossoms that prevails over and almost hides every thing else, in the fruit-garden and orchard. What exquisite differences, and distinctions, and resemblances, there are between all the various blossoms of the fruit-trees; and no less in their general effect than in their separate details. The almond-blossom, which comes while the tree is quite bare of leaves, is of a bright blush-rose colour; and when they are fully blown, the tree, if it has been kept to a compact head instead of being perhitted to straggle, looks like one huge rose, magnified by some fairy magic, to deck the bosom of some fair giantess. The various kinds of plum follow—the blossoms of which are snow-white, and as full and clustering as those of the almond. The peach and nectarine, which are now in full bloom, are unlike either of the above; and their sweet effect, as if growing out of the hard bare wall, or the rough wooden paling, is peculiarly pretty. They are of a deep blush colour, and of a delicate bell-shape—and their divisions open or shut, as the cherishing sun reaches or recedes from them. But perhaps the bloom that is richest and most promising in its general appearance, is that of the cherry, clasping its white honours all round the long straight branches, from heel to point, and not letting a leaf or bit of stem be seen, except the three or four leaves that come as a green finish at the extremity of each branch. The pear blossom is also very rich and full; but the apple (loveliest of all) is scarcely as yet open.

I am afraid we must now turn away, however reluctantly, from the rest of those sweet sights that April presents to us in the country, or we shall leave ourselves neither space nor inclination to glance at its other claims elsewhere. But we must first listen for a moment to the spring melody that now breaks involuntarily from the love-inspired hearts of the happy birds. And first let us hearken to the cuckoo, shooting out its soft and mellow, yet powerful voice, till it seems to fill the whole concave of the heavens with its two mysterious notes—the most primitive of musical melodies. Who can listen to those notes for the first time in spring, and not feel his school-days come back to him—and not, as he did then,

—“look a thousand ways
In bush, and tree, and sky?”

But he will look in vain; for lucky—or rather unlucky, to my thinking) is he who has ever seen a cuckoo—for they are the shyest of all birds. I saw one once, for the first time, last May, flutter heavily out of an old hawthorn bush, and flur awkwardly across the meadow, as I was listening in rapt attention to its lonely voice; and I fear that the sight will, for the future, take away all the mystery of the sound, and with it the best half of its beauty.

If we happen to be wandering forth on a warm still evening, during the last week in this month, and passing near a road-side orchard, or skirting a little copse in returning from our twilight ramble, or sitting listlessly on a lawn near some thick plantation, waiting for bed-time, we may chance to be startled from our meditations (of whatever kind they may be) by a sound, issuing from among the distant leaves. That is the nightingale's voice. The cold spells of winter, that had kept him so long tongue-tied, and frozen the deep fountains of his heart, yield before the mild breath of spring, and he is voluble once more. It is as if the flood of song had been swelling within his breast ever since it last ceased to flow, and was now gushing forth uncontrollably, and as if he had no will to control it: for when it does stop for a space, it is suddenly, as if for want of breath. In our climate the nightingale seldom sings above six weeks; beginning usually the last week in April. I mention this because few are aware of it; and many who would be delighted to hear him, do not think of going to listen to his song till after it has ceased. I believe it is never to be heard after the young are hatched.

There are several other singers that make their début in the bird-concerts this month. But as their song is not peculiar to this period, and we have still many things to attend to that are, we must pass them by for the present. In fact, we must quit the country altogether, as the country; first, however, mentioning that now begins that most execrable of all practices, angling. Now man, “lordly man,” first begins to set his wit to a simple fish; and having succeeded in attracting it to his lure, watches it for a space floundering about in its crystal waters, in the agonies of death; and when he is tired of this sport, drags it to the green bank, among the grass, and moss, and wild flowers, and stains them all with its blood! The “gentle” reader may be sure that I would willingly have restrained altogether from forcing upon the attention this hateful subject, especially amid such scenes and objects as we have just been contemplating; but I was afraid that my silence might have seemed to give consent to it.

We must now transport ourselves to the environs of London, and see what this happy season is producing there; for to leave the very heart of the country, and cast ourselves at once into the very heart of the town, would be likely to put us into a temper not suited to the time. Now, on Palm Sunday, boys and girls (youths and maidens have now-a-days got above so childish a practice) may be met early in the morning, in blithes, but breakfastless companies, sallying forth towards the pretty outlets about Hampstead and Highgate, on the one side the water, and Camberwell and Clapham on the other, all of which they imagine to be “the country,” there to sport away the pleasant hours till dinner-time, and then return home with joy in their hearts, endless appetites in their stomachs, and bunches of the willow with its silken bloom-buds in their hands, as trophies of their travels.

Now, at last, the Easter week is arrived, and the poor have for once in the year the best of it; setting all things, but their own sovereign will, at a wise defiance. The journeyman who works on Easter Monday, even though he were a tailor itself, should lose his caste, and be sent to the Coventry of mechanics, wherever that may be. In fact, it cannot happen. On Easter Monday ranks change places—Jobson is as good as Sir John—the “rude mechanical” is “monarch of all he surveys” from the summit of Greenwich-hill; and when he thinks fit to say, “It is our royal pleasure to be drunk!” who shall dispute the proposition? Not I, for one. When our English mechanics accuse their betters of oppressing them, the said betters should reverse the old appeal, and refer from Philip sober to Philip drunk; and then nothing more could be said. But now, they have no betters, even in their own notion of the matter. And, in the name of all that is transitory, envy them not their brief supremacy! It will be over before the end of the week, and they will be as eager to return to their labour as they now are to escape from it; for the only thing that an Englishman, whether high or low, cannot endure patiently for a week together, is, unmingled amusement. At this time, however, he is determined to try. Accordingly, on Easter Monday all the narrow lanes and blind alleys of our metropolis pour forth their dingy denizens in the suburban fields and villages, in search of the said amusement, which is plentifully provided for them by another class, even less enviable than the one on whose patronage they depend; for of all callings, the most melancholy is that of purveyor of pleasure to the poor. During the Monday our determined holiday-maker, as in duty bound, contrives, by the aid of a little or not a little artificial stimulus, to be happy in a tolerably exemplary manner. On the Tuesday, he fancies himself happy to-day, because he felt himself so yesterday. On the Wednesday he cannot tell what has come to him, but every ten minutes he wishes himself at home, where he never goes but to sleep. On Thursday he finds out the secret, that he is heartily sick of doing nothing, but is ashamed to confess it; and then what is the use of going to work before his money is spent? On Friday he swears that he is a fool for throwing away the greater part of his quarter's savings, without having any thing to show for it, and gets gloriously drunk with the rest, to prove his words; passing the pleasantest night of all the week in a watch-house. And on Saturday, after thanking “his worship” for his good advice, of which he does not remember a word, he comes to the wise determination that, after all, there is nothing like working all day long in silence, and at night spending his earnings and his breath in beer and politics! So much for the Easter week of a London holiday-maker.

But there is a sport belonging to Easter Monday, which is not confined to the lower classes, and which, fun forbid that I should pass over silently. If the reader has not, during his boyhood, performed the exploit of riding to the turn-out of the stag on Epping Forest; following the hounds all day long, at a respectful distance; returning home in the evening, with the loss of nothing but his hat, his hunting whip, and his horse—not to mention a portion of his netter person; and finishing the day by joining the Lady Mayoress's ball at the Mansion-house; if the reader has not done all this when a boy, I will not tantalize him by expatiating on the superiority of those who have. And if he has done it, I need not tell him that he has no cause to envy his friend who escaped with a flesh wound from the fight of Waterloo; for there is not a pin to choose between them?

I have little to tell the reader in regard to London exclusively this month; which is lucky, because I have left myself less than no space at all to tell it in. I must mention, however, that now is heard in her streets the prettiest of all the cries which are peculiar to them—“Come buy my primroses!”—and but for which the Londoners would have no idea that spring was at hand. Now, spoiled children make “fools” of their mammams and papas; which is but fair, seeing that the said mammams and papas return the compliment during all the rest of the year. Now, not even a sceptical apprentice but is religiously persuaded of the merits of Good-Friday, and the propriety of its being so called—since it procures him two Sundays in the week instead of one. Finally, now, exhibitions of paintings court the public attention, and obtain it, in every quarter, on the principle, I suppose, that the eye has, at this season of the year, a natural hungering and thirsting after the colours of the spring leaves and flowers, and rather than not meet with them at all, it is content to find them on painted canvasses!

New Monthly.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Voluntary Exile.—A paragraph, with these initial words, is now going the rounds of the papers, stating, that a beautiful and accomplished young lady, an orphan, from the south, has lately taken the veil, and gone into seclusion for life, at the Ursuline convent, Mount Benedict, resigning a large fortune to the disposal of the priests. We notice this article, not to doubt its authenticity, for such things have happened before; not to censure the young lady, for she, no doubt, acted from the purest motives; neither to intimate a suspicion of any undue influence on the part of those who now have the disposal of her fortune, but simply to state our conviction, that such a step by an individual of either sex, or of any religious persuasion, arises from a mistaken idea of duty. A life of solitary piety is no where suggested in the scriptures, while almost every precept of the gospel inculcates a life of busy active benevolence; a faithful discharge of our duties in the world instead of a withdrawal from it. We venture to say, that not one of the christian precepts can be properly fulfilled in a life of seclusion. Man was not created for the sake of himself alone, but for the sake of others; not merely to seek his own individual good, but the good of those around him:

“To find a heaven by helping others there.”

If this be admitted it necessarily follows that he or she who withdraws from the world for the mere selfish purpose of promoting their own individual happiness, is as morally culpable as the soldier that deserts his colours. The crown is promised to the victor in the trials and temptations of a useful and active life, not to him who shrinks from the contest, and retires from the field. In our opinion, the wife and mother who faithfully discharges the duties of these two endearing and sacred characters, does more for the cause of true religion than all the nuns that ever took the veil. Such a woman is the “good and faithful servant that has been faithful over many things;” while she who weakly shrinks from venturing on these duties, openly disobeys the first recorded command. She may have much piety, but very little practical religion.

Historical Painting.—A western artist, Mr. Hervieu, has arrived at Washington with a picture, the subject of which is the landing of La Fayette at Cincinnati. This picture, sixteen feet by twelve, is the fruit of eighteen months' labour. Amongst the figures represented in it, there are fifty portraits, which are stated to be so accurate that all the faces are immediately recognised. There are two or three portraits, says the Evening Post, to which particular interest attaches. One is that of Mr. Wyeth, who aided in throwing the tea overboard in Boston harbour, and who died at Cincinnati during the last summer. The other is of a German woman, who gave to La Fayette, as he came out of the prison of Olmutz, a cup of milk and a three franc piece, and who, by a singular coincidence, was one of the multitude who assembled on the shore at Cincinnati to welcome the nation's guest on his arrival at that city. The artist has availed himself of this event by introducing the good German woman in the costume of her country.

Summer Retreats.—The neighbourhood of this city can boast of a number of rural and pleasant public places, where the feeble may retire for the renovation of health, and the weary and care-worn citizen forget his sorrows amid the charms of nature. Among these the mansion at Orange Springs, which is but a short distance, offers as many inducements as perhaps can be met with in one situation.

Mrs. Read.—A number of inquiries having been made respecting the residence of this lady, recommended in a late number of the Mirror for her skill in teaching the piano-forte, we take occasion to say that she may be seen at No. 195 Orange, a few doors above Broome-street.

Remarkable.—A young man is now living at Seville who is quite blind during the day, and cannot walk the streets without a guide, but who can see perfectly well at night, when it is nearly dark, so as to be able to read the smallest character.

“And weltering, dies the primrose with his blood.”—Graham.

LOVE IS LIKE A LITTLE BEE.

AS SUNG BY MADAME VESTRIS—MUSIC BY WILLIAM WEST.

ALLEGRETTO.

Love is like a lit-tle bee, that ri-fles ev'-ry pret-ty flow'r; Love is like a blight-ed rose, that wi-thers in an hour; Love is like a but-ter-fly, and like a flow-ing stream, And like a wea-ther vane it is, ah, yes, and like a dream. Love is like a sunbeam too, and like the stars of night, Like a tear, a smile, a sigh, a mis'ry and delight, And love it is like ev'ry thing, and yet like nothing too: Then what is love? ah, no one knows, not either I nor you. Love is like a little bee, that rifles ev'ry flower, Love is like a blighted rose, &c.

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

CHARADE.

NAME me my first—it is ever near,
Dweller of earth, through thy brief career;
Turn where thou wilt by darkness or day,
This fiend shall spectre thy varied way;
None from the power of his spell can save,
Twin of thy birth it shall frown at thy grave.
It comes like a cloud o'er the rich soft light
Of hope's free smile when her eye is bright,
Till the beam that cheered the wanderer on,
Trembles a moment and then is gone;
'Tis the iron which pierces the captive's soul—
The viper that lurks at ambition's goal—
'Tis the worm that lies hid in the heart for aye,
Eating love's fresh sweet buds away—
The canker of beauty slow wasting her bloom—
The shadow of death that points to the tomb.
Name me my last—he comes at the call,
And around his brow for a coronal,
The halo of glory is proudly set,
But mark thou, passion has darkened it.
Where is the battle and where the storm?
There shalt thou view his terrible form;
Where sweeps the ship through the rolling sea?
With the gloom and the tempest there wends he;
Where fails the bear mid the polar waste?
Far on is his chainless footstep traced.
Look o'er the earth's far-reaching length;
And the sullen deep in its giant strength;
Look to the sun in his kingly march,
Look to the night's resplendent arch,
Planets and moons round its azure wall—
He hath numbered, and meted, and bounded all.
Name me my whole—'tis a sound to dwell
In the dreamy depths of a peri's shell;
A silvery, clear, and harp-like tone,
Sweet as our brightest dreams have known.
Call me that name—she comes in her pride,
And the graces throng by her vestal side,
While the dimpled loves, in their circling play,
Carpet with dewy flowers her way.
Where is the tear for the erring sated?
Where the couch for the dying spread?
Where is breathed the requiem prayer
For the parted spirit? she is there!
Whose is worth's exhaustless mine?
Whose is friendship's holiest shrine?
Whose is love's undying flame?
Beauty and purity? name her name.

[Solution in our next.]

left of the river Liris, and famous for being the birth-place of C. Marius and Cicero, two citizens, who, as Pompey said in a public speech, each in his turn preserved Rome from ruin. The territory of Arpinum was rude and mountainous, and Cicero applies to it Homer's description of Rhæa—

"'Tis rough indeed, yet breeds a generous race."

Cicero's family seat was about three miles from the town, in a situation extremely pleasant, and well adapted to the nature of that beautiful climate. It was surrounded with groves and shady walks, leading from the house to a river then called Fibrenus, which was divided into two equal streams by a little island, covered with trees and a portico, contrived both for study and exercise, whither Cicero used to retire when he had any particular work on his hands. "The clearness and rapidity of the stream, murmuring through a rocky channel; the shade and verdure of its banks, planted with tall poplars; the remarkable coldness of the water; and, above all, its falling by a cascade into the noble river Liris, a little below the island," give us the idea of a most beautiful scene, as Cicero himself has described it. The house, Cicero informs us, was small and humble in his grandfather's time, according to the ancient frugality, like the Sabine farm of old Curius; but his father beautified and enlarged it into a spacious and handsome habitation. It is now possessed by a convent of monks, and called the "Villa of St. Dominick." The villa of Marius was about twelve miles distant from Arpino, and on the spot now stands the only convent of the austere order of La Trappe in Italy. Its present name is "Cassa Mari." Arpino is seated upon rather a steep declivity, and contains fourteen thousand inhabitants. The busts of Cicero and Marius, in two niches in the square, are carefully shown to every stranger; and the people are proud of enumerating those Romans among the former citizens of Arpino.

ARABIAN NIGHTS' ENTERTAINMENTS.—Few literary efforts have been more misrepresented or less understood by the common reader than the charming eastern fictions, known by the name of the "Arabian Nights," always excepting Gulliver's Travels. There are a kind of people with much solemnity of visage and more gravity than wisdom, who look upon Scheherazade's ingenious narratives as a mere collection of nursery tales, and solely calculated for the intellects of children, while they are in reality the only correct picture of the habits, manners, and feelings of the eastern world in the English language. The quantity of invention manifested in their construction is astonishing, and in the thousand and one stories no two are to be found alike. It is a book that will at the same time amuse the child and instruct the philosopher.

dark ages was an annual festival which was celebrated in several churches of France in commemoration of the flight into Egypt. On this occasion a young girl, splendidly dressed with a child in her arms, was set upon a mule, richly caparisoned. The mule was led to the altar in solemn procession, and high mass was said with great pomp. The mule was taught to kneel at proper places; a hymn, no less childish than impious, was sung in his praise, and when the ceremony was ended, the priest, instead of the usual words with which he dismissed the people, brayed three times, to which the people responded in the same language! This practice, however, did not prevail universally, and its absurdity at last contributed to abolish it. If there was any genuine piety in the whole ceremony, it was in the poor quadruped, who merely obeyed his masters.

DEATH OF INFANTS.—It appears to have been an inherent idea in the human mind, in all nations, and from the remotest antiquity, that the future condition of those who died in infancy was necessarily happy; and it was left for the dogmas of modern theologians to inculcate a different doctrine. Eustathius assures us that among the Greeks it was the custom never to bury their children either by night or in full day, but at the first appearance of morning; and that they did not call their departure by the name of death, but by a softer appellation, composed of two Greek words, importing that they were taken away to the embraces of Aurora; rising, as it were, from a momentary sleep to a glorious morning in the skies.

SONNET.

"Già riede Primavera,
Col suo fiorito aspetto."

GLAD season of reviving nature's charms,
We greet thy opening flowers, and sunny glow;
That hastens from the field the chilling blow,
And into joyous life the insect warms.
We greet thy mystic power which in our hearts,
As o'er the mountain, through the forest brakes,
On high banks of the azure wave, awakes
Each tender blade; from the swelling bud starts
The infant leaf, flow'ring its dreary wastes.
Now rolls the purest incense of warm praise,
Up with its native music—sweetest lays!
Felt, though unheard. The enraptured soul tastes
Of every grateful fount new pleasures given,
With an unearthly relish by kind heaven. LABA.

GEORGE P. MORRIS, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

Published every Saturday, at 163 William-street, between Beekman and Ann streets.—Terms four dollars per annum, payable in advance.—No subscription received for a less period than one year.

J. SEYMOUR, PRINTER, JOHN-STREET.

NEW-YORK MIRROR,

AND LADIES' LITERARY GAZETTE.

VOLUME VII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 24, 1860.

NUMBER 42.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

EXTRACT FROM ADOLPH, AN UNPUBLISHED POEM.

When morning looked along the golden east,
Adolph would walk the solitary strand,
Behold the gorgeous sky as it increased,
And watch its influence o'er the sea and land;
See every beam upon the sweet dew's feast,
And hill, and vale, as by some wizard's wand,
Filled with a million re-awakening flowers,
And then exclaim, "a glorious world is ours!"

"Why do I hear the young and noble heart
Filling its home with misanthropic sighs?
Why do I see, mid gilded halls, depart
Health from the cheek, and gladness from the eyes?
Why do I see some self-tormentor start,
And fret, and foam, by which he daily dies?
And these where pleasure falls in golden showers?
'Tis strange—'tis strange—a glorious world is ours!"

"From the day's birth-hour to the evening's close,
I can find music in the rushing ocean,
Fruit on the tree, and fragrance in the rose,
Pictures in the eve-clouds' panoramic motion,
Peace in the sheltered bower's green repose,
And mountain-altars for the heart's devotion;
Morals in streams that flow, and leaves that fall;
Beauty in each—Omnipotence in all.

"Qui fit Mæcenæ, et cetera. 'Tis a question
Still standing like a cause without effect.
The world's unphilosophic indigestion
Treats it with most impassive disrespect.
Mankind! I'm grieved the world has nought to rest you on;
But, as for me, while these fair fields are decked
With feasts of fruitage and with beds of flowers,
I still must say, a glorious world is ours!"

Thus would the orphan Adolph muse and think,
When mingling with the worlds' complaining throng;
'Thus would he weave his thought's unpolished link,
(For spite of our advice he'd sing in song);
'Thus watch the rough wave from the ocean's brink,
And let his rhymes as roughly roll along.
Sages! if such were profitless employ,
Adolph, you know, was but an orphan boy.

Boyhood! the word hath magic in its sound!
When the young laughing heart made holiday,
Ran through the sunny noon its restless round,
'Then sank to slumber soft o'ercome with play;
And even in sleep a world of pleasure found,
And wandered with his playmates far away;
Plundered again the linnets from its nest,
And warmed it with as innocent a breast:

Watched if his kite still caught his straining view,
The hoop with some chivalric rival rolled,
The mimic boat around the basin blew,
Rejoiced when well the long-aimed marble told,
Mustered his troop that at each moment grew
More uncontrollable and uncontrolled.
Oh happy—happy—happy—happy time,
"Terque-querque" without care or crime.

ALPHA.

TO THE FIRST SPRING BIRD.

Welcome! first bird of spring,
To these wild woods and sunny skies again;
Joy's in the wave of thy returning wing,
And in thy long lost strain.

When autumn's wasted form
Was laid to rest upon the lonely bier,
And winter, glorying in his might of storm,
Usurped the conquered year,

We saw thee sadly gaze,
Like one long prisoned in his wiry cage,
Then warbling out soft melancholy lays,
Mount on thy pilgrimage.

Sweet bird, where didst thou roam
Through the long transit of thy hapless stay?
Hadst thou a loved one, callow brood, and home;
In southern climes away?

Amid the wild of flowers
That nature squanders on her tropic glades,
Didst thou all joyous in the spicy bowers,
Chant to the dark-eyed maids?

They would not list to thee,
Bird of the humble plume and roundelay,
For theirs are minstrel's of a prouder lay.

Well, thou hast come to me!
Though in this wild and hyperborean sphere;
I would not turn me from thy minstrelsy,
Were sweeter songsters near:

For thy loved music falls
Like angel harpings on my raptured ears,
And from the tomb of memory recalls
My bright and sinless years.

Joyous and fresh they rise
With long, long buried names to boyhood dear,
And the far vanished light of radiant eyes
That lit my pathway here:

And with them smiling throng
The dancing feelings of that stirring hour,
And many a faded hope, heart-boarded long,
Crushed in its opening flower.

Therefore sing freely on,
Thou living lyre, by nature tuned and taught;
Sing for the memory of the years by-gone
With youth's wild joyance fraught.

Oft when the zephyr's wing
At twilight rocks thee on the whispering pine,
I'll sit beside the forest's curtained spring
And blend my strain with thine.

Then come, sweet warbler, come,
And never from my bosom wander more;
Here shalt thou find a rest and welcome home,
Till life's sad song is o'er.

Thus when my days are past,
And the high spirit breaks its bonds of clay,
May I a home and refuge find at last,
In the bright heavens away.

PROTEUS.

THE CRUSADER'S RETURN.

The knight had returned from Palestine,
Where his glorious work was done;
For the crescent had bowed to salvation's sign,
A christian king held away benign,
And the holy land was won.

He spurred him fast o'er his native land,
Where Thames' sweet waters glide;
He came at the head of his gallant band,
Whose hearts and swords were at his command,
To see his promised bride.

He lighted at his lady's bower,
And thought his prize was won;
But another possessed her father's power,
Another ruled o'er her father's tower,
And his blue-eyed maid was—gone!

They led him where his loved one lay,
And on her mossy stone
Daily he knelt him down to pray,
Daily he wept o'er the late turned clay.
Till three long months had flown.

And then he took his cross divine,
And the pilgrim's gown and hood;
And at the foot of the blessed shrine,
In the holy land of Palestine,
Died Albert, the brave and good.

F. C.

POPULAR TALES.

A SPANISH TALE.

IN THREE CHAPTERS—CHAPTER THE FIRST.

THE sun was going down upon the ridge of the mountain above Majente on a fine evening in July, when my honoured master Don Francisco de Almorin, and his valet Tomaso, came in sight of the ferry across the Jucar. There had been some reports of robbers among the hills, and they stopped to see what a crowd was made of, that had gathered on the river's side. They might have saved themselves the delay, for the crowd was nothing worse than the peasantry of the neighbourhood looking on the ferry-boat, which was upset, and lying on a little island in the midst of the stream. The next day was to be the fair of Valencia, and heaps of partridges, hams, eggs, and cheese, lay on the bank, waiting till the flood should pass away. The outcries of the peasants came up to the travellers' ears like the clamour of robbers, and the peasants themselves were still more puzzled by the travellers, who had in their hurry mistaken the road, and were riding within an inch of the precipice. "Nothing human ever gal-human could ever gallop there at all," was another. The best hunter for twenty miles round acknowledged, that he would as soon break his neck at once as follow bird or goat there; and the priest, taking out his breviary, began the "Exhortation against dealing with the devil." The horseman had by this time got over the rocks, and, plunging into the valley, disappeared. Whatever differences of opinion there might have been as to their appearance, there could be none as to their vanishing. The alcalde, a man of great gravity, and few words as became him, withdrawing the priest a step or two from the crowd, and holding council with him, returned, and declared, that what they had seen was an undoubted apparition, and that they might expect to hear great news, probably of a battle in Portugal. The priest went round, giving his benediction to the merchandise, and the crowd repeated their ave marias with much fervency. Some had seen the spectres disappear in a flash of lightning, others could swear that the hollow in the rock, where they plunged, had grown visibly larger; and one, a pale youth, with a hectic cheek and a sunken eye, who had written the last christmas carol, and was in fact the village poet, silently followed with a burning glance and an outstretched hand, the motion of a small gray cloud that rose from behind the hill, and grew into gold and purple as it met the sun. He afterwards wrote some lines upon it, saying that he had seen the spirits going up in a chariot of fire, and they were often sung afterwards through the country. But a sudden turn of the road let out the horsemen at once, galloping down with whip and spur to the river's side. Then came such a scene of confusion as it would take Lope to describe; peasants rolling over peasants; the alcalde in full flight; the priest on his knees, calling on every saint together; and more boar-hams, sheep-cheeses, partridges, and eggs, driven into the stream by the general rush, than I suppose ever floated down a Valencian river before.

The cavaliers were at length recognised to be flesh and blood. The alcalde gathered his gown round him, and retreated in anger beyond the rabble. The priest put up his breviary in some confusion, and the rabble roared with laughter, and clamoured for the news of the heretics and the last battle. The poet, after gazing on the noble figure and handsome countenance of the Don, pointed out the up-turned boat, and offered him a bed in the village till the flood should go down. "It is impossible, my friend," said the cavalier; "I must pass the river to-night, for to-night I must be in Valencia. Is there no other boat?" "No," was the answer; "that was the only one known within memory; the villagers were attached to it; it was probable that they never would have another." "Is there no ford?" "None for forty miles." "Then stand out of my way; farewell." Don Francisco struck in the spur, and, with a motion of his hand to his servant to follow, darted forwards amid an outcry of terror from the crowd. The flood was high, and had swelled higher within the last few minutes. It now came down, roaring and dashing sheets of foam upon the shore. The horse stooped his head to the water's edge, started back, plunged, and wheeled round. Tomaso looked the picture of reluctance. "Stay where you are, sir," said Don Francisco; "take care of the horses, and follow me when this pestilential river goes down. This is my birth-night. If I do not appear at home, it will be taken for granted that a hundred foolish things have happened to me. Leave the beach clear!" The next instant he sprang off his horse, threw the bridle on the valet's arm, and was rolling away in the waters.

The Don was a bold swimmer, and had once, under the evil spirit of champagne and a wager, swam with an Englishman from Port St. Mary's to the Fishmarket-gate at Cadiz, after supper. The Englishman was drowned, and the Spaniard won his wager, and a fever, which sent him to mountain air and the Biscay physicians for six months. Having dared the ocean, he, I suppose, thought he might defy a river; and, at his first plunge, he rose so far in the stream that the peasants raised a general shout of admiration. Yet the river was strong, and to reach the opposite side was the matter in dispute between it and the Don. But the river was on its own ground, and, of course, soon had the advantage. The waves seemed to tumble over each other, as if to reach the very a cork. The admiration of the peasants grew silent; a huge billow, high as the alcalde's house, and white as all the pigeons that ever covered it, came down thundering and flashing, till every soul left his wares, and ran up the beach. The mill-dam had burst, and on looking back there was nothing to be seen but sheet on sheet of foam, rolling baskets here and there, a borrico snorting and struggling down the torrent, and fragments of mill-spokes, tables, and three-legged stools, which the miller's family had abandoned as ransom for their lives.

After much gazing, a cap was seen whirled on the shore, which Tomaso recognised as his master's, and which, with many tears, he put up, declaring that he should preserve it for the old countess, who would think no reward too high for a relic of her departed son. Night fell rapidly, and the crowd retired, telling stories the whole way of the floods that presaged the plague, and the arrival of the Moors.

Don Francisco had reached the shore. The bursting of the mill-dam had probably saved his life, for in his last struggle with the eddy it broke the current in which he would infallibly have gone whirling to the ocean, dead or alive, and dashed him on the bank, some miles down the ford.

For the first few minutes he was totally insensible to his escape. He had felt the rush of the waters over him; his ears had been filled with a roar, and his eyes covered with a darkness, till all passed away. His first sensation on the bank was that of being able to struggle, and he flung his arms round him on the billows of a bed of the thickest thistles that ever grew under a Spanish sun. With eyes still closed against the waters, and ears filled with their horrible hissing, he was at last convinced that he had changed his element, and, with hands and limbs stung by a million of thorns, he sprang on his feet. The night had fallen, and the sky sparkled through the branches of the wilderness. But neither cottage lights, stray peasants, nor wood-tracks, would come for his calling. The thought of the tertulla in his family mansion came into his mind. He thought of the boleras and the quadrilles, the music and the supper; and himself, the honour and hope of all, shivering in wet clothes in the open air, thinking of robbers and wolves, with a wilderness on one side, and on the other nothing but a confounded river, that had nearly sent him down for food to the Mediterranean lobsters. A new dash of foam from a passing wave drove him back into the wood, and by the help of a star, that twinkled like a diamond, to guide him over and about the trunks of endless oaks, poplars, and elms, some fallen, some bending to their fall, and others clustered like pillars of a cathedral, he felt his way onwards. After an hour or two of tumbling, struggling, and execrations at the folly of having ever learned to swim, the light, not too good at best, darkened suddenly, and he found himself under a wall. He now called out loudly, but no one answered. He might as well have spoken to the trees, among which he now appeared likely to pass the night. At length, in creeping round the wall, he caught the glimpse of a lamp through a crevice, and before he could cry out again, a young female glided from an inner door, and took her seat under the lamp, which hung in a kind of rude summer pavilion. Here he began to think of an adventure. The female might be handsome or not, for her back was turned to him. But to raise his voice would have probably made matters worse, and not to put her to flight became the grand object. Yet, to see her in his present position was impossible; the crevice was the narrowest slit that was ever made in a stone wall; to widen it was desperate, for the stones were masses large enough for the foundation of the rock of Gibraltar. The Don, catholic as he was, was once or twice on the point of wishing for the aid of the cloven-footed architect, who had built the bridge of Saragossa in one night, and carried it away in another. The figure of the female was delicate, and some notes of her voice, borne towards him by the echo of the pavilion, pleased him still more. At that moment he could have sworn by the Santa Casa, that she had eyes as jetty as the locks that hung over them shining in the lamp, rosy lips, carnation cheeks, and teeth that made all the pearls of the earth black in the comparison. The wall was broken into many hollows and corners, like those of the old Moorish buildings, and after a short search he found a recess which placed him on the opposite side of the garden. A withered vine was his ladder, and he mounted to the top of the wall. The female was young, but she showed neither the eyes of jet nor the cheeks of carnation; her head was leant upon a thin white hand, and she was looking intently on a piece of embroidery, which lay on her knee. In a few moments she took it up, and began to work at it; but she seemed to be thinking of other things, for, after an effort or two, she sighed deeply, and dropped it, and upon her knee. Then her low, broken song was begun again, and he heard these words, in a very sweet voice:

"The grave is but a calmer bed
Where mortals sleep a longer sleep;
A shelter for the houseless head,
A spot where wretches cease to weep."

The voice would then sink into a murmur, and after a sigh or two, and a tear hastily swept from the eye, begin again, "The grave is but a calmer bed," and so on. There was not much in this, but the voice was touching, and even the raising of her hand to her head was so full of a pretty tenderness, that the Don began to imagine himself in love.

This was a matter of the greatest astonishment to him. He had been a bold gallant, if the Valencia Diario de los Amores was to be believed; but the order to join his regiment before it moved to the Portuguese frontier, had found him able to take leave of the walls of his own native town, and look back towards it from every hill up to Elvas, without more than remembering that there dwelt the lips of the Lady Isadora de Alcazar, or the still more renowned eyes of the Lady Maria de Dolores. How he had escaped from beauties covered with jewels, and tempting him with still brighter glances, to hang upon a wall in a forest, where probably more than one wolf was waiting for his coming down, and all this to look upon a country girl of seventeen, made him feel excessively astonished. He began to think that he was doing something foolish, and was preparing to descend, when the voice murmured through the thicket, and he heard the words, "The grave is but a calmer sleep," for the tenth time, but the sound seemed sweeter than ever. His turning round shook the vines, the singer gave a startled look upwards, and he saw a face of great beauty; a pale forehead, from which locks as black as ebony had been shaken back by her looking up; a cheek, flushed with surprise, and a pair of eyes that, under the lamp, sparkled like a pair of large diamonds. Don Francisco in another step would have crossed the wall, when a musket was fired from behind; the bullet dashed the stone into shivers round his head, his hold gave way, and he found himself buried to the neck in lime, bricks, and bramble-bushes. On his winding himself out of this pit, he determined to try the wall again, declare his rank, and make the unknown beauty an offer of the whole Almorin palace, with all therein. But the lamp had been put out, the arbour was deserted, he could not hear so much as the rustle of a bird; all had disappeared like the money of a fairy tale; and in a night that seemed doubly dark on purpose to puzzle him, he at length scrambled out of the wood, and, to his wonder, found himself within a short league of Valencia.

The palace was by this time crowded; the tertulla was in all its glory. Lemonade and iced waters, Majorca cakes, and Maltese oranges were making a hundred circles of the ball-rooms; and the lights blazed down from the huge windows on half the populace of Valencia, dancing in the courts below. The captain-general's ball was nothing to it, though he had brought his first fiddler from Naples, and had produced a famine of ice in the city for a month in the hottest part of the year before. But the Don's mind was changed upon things of this kind, and he would have made his way up a private staircase, and thought of the evening's adventure in his bed, but for a sudden cry, and the sight of a man rolling from the top of the stairs to the bottom. It was Tomaso, who had been ferried over the river about two hours before, and had come full speed home, with no small doubt of ever seeing him again; but he had found the tertulla begun, and he was too much of a lover of dancing and eating to disturb them by opening his mind for the night. His cry of surprise brought out the servants. The Don's coming was now known through the house, and as escape was impossible, he gave way to the preparations for his appearance, and entered the state apartment. He was received as sons and heirs of palaces and mines in Mexico always have been, and will always be received. The gentlemen complimented him on his dia de santo, the Lady Maria de Dolores chid him openly for coming so late, and two hundred and fifty eyes of the first-rate, blue, brown, and black, thanked him for coming at all.

The Don was a handsome man. They say neither man nor woman ever possessed beauty without a knowledge of its value to the smallest grain; but after the first salutations he felt all that could be said—looked somewhat dull—sleep hung on him, and he sat down in a recess, where the figures of the dancers, and the sounds of the violins and guitars, passed over his senses like the sights and sounds of a dream.

With his elbow on his knee, and his head on his hand, he was going over the occurrences of the night. From struggling through the stream he had arrived in the forest, and was

den. The inlaid floor at his feet looked to him a green turf, knotted and sprinkled with roses. He saw a delicate figure sitting in the shelter of a vine, and all the sounds that reached him from the tertulla, only made up the murmur of the words—"The grave is but a calmer bed." He had taken courage, and was just going to make a speech, and melt the beauty that sat before him bright as an icicle, when he felt a blow on the shoulder. The forest was gone at once, the chandeliers glared on his eyes, and before him he saw laughing immoderately Alonzo de Pinto, supposed to be the most impudent man south of the Ebro. He had that night waltzed with the Princess d'Eboli, flirted with the French ambassador's wife in the very teeth of his excellency, and put on, for the first time, his uniform as a captain in the hussars of Numantia. Don Francisco could have flung him through the window, but the hussar would not see his anger, and laughing, till he brought a concourse round them, charged him with little short of sleeping in that illustrious company.

"Awake!" said the hussar, "if you wish to see the most ridiculous sight on earth at this moment—the terror of the old captain-general for his house, which, unless the Virgin and the winds are merciful, will, he swears, be a cinder by to-morrow." Don Francisco probably wished that some of his mother's guests were there to take their chance; however, he said nothing, and suffered himself to be dragged along. In another apartment, where the windows showed the whole reach of the Guadalaviar from the Serranos bridge to that of the Real, he saw the old man in the middle of his sides-de-camp, making the most extraordinary gestures, running from window to window like a monkey, then flinging himself on a couch, and swallowing cup on cup of coffee, which, he said, were necessary to strengthen his voice in the emergency of the town's being set on fire. There was a good deal of laughing at this comical distress, but the Don, thinking it a matter of politeness under the family roof, was approaching to inquire how he could assist him, when the hussar, looking him in the face with an affected gravity, said, "I hope, Don, you have a passionate desire to hear the history of O'Reilly's expedition to Algiers?" Now the Don had a particular aversion to this subject, for it had been rhymed on by all the bad poets of Spain, and heaven be thanked for all its gifts, as old Moretin says, "if they could be eaten, there would be no fear of famine for a long time." It had been turned into a ballad in his regiment by the quarter-master. He had heard it strummed to guitars through the three summer months of his quarters in Leon, and he had seen half-a-dozen tragedies on it hissed. But the old officer saw him, and sprang from his couch; Don Francisco followed him to the window. "See, my friend, see!" said he in a passion, "what your Valencian rascals are doing!" The Don looked up and down the river, but it lay like a sheet of beaten silver, gently waving in the moonlight. The sky was as blue as a violet, and the trees of the Alameda, to the left below, looked like tufts of green feathers, scarcely shaking in the light air. "I protest," said he, "I see nothing but the finest night possible!" "You are a young man," retorted the captain-general, in rather a sharp tone, "and can see nothing but what is to be seen; but when you are older, you will be more suspicious of all this security. There are five hundred, yes, five thousand incendiaries at this moment in front of the Villa Real palace; and at the moment a flame shot up to the sky, and shouts were heard. Don Francisco would have called the domestics, and sallied at their head, but the old man restrained him. "It does not become your dignity," said he, "or mine, to be seen cutting those villains into fragments. I have already despatched an aid-de-camp to the hussars at Villivica, and they will make a supper of them." "They are coming already, then," said the Don; "I hear the trumpets." "Impossible! my dear Don," said his excellency, and he looked at his watch; "but you are a young man—your ears are privileged to hear all kinds of things." When his excellency, perceiving that his observations were not well taken, said with a smile of conciliation, "I was once like you, but the night I walked the quarter-deck of the San Stefano, off Algiers—" His hearer shrunk at the sound, and the young hussar buried his face in his pocket handkerchief. A red flash rose again over the Villa Real. In a few moments the trumpets of the cavalry were heard, and they came down the quay at full trot, wheeling over the bridge towards the fire. The dancing stopped, and all the company crowded to the windows to see the troops; and indeed they made a showy spectacle, as they came into the moonlight, and passed along by the statues on the battlements, which had often been said to make a little army of themselves; the tossing of plumes, the glittering of sabres, the lifting up of the silver trumpets in the air as they sounded, and the constant move. I think a painter might have made much of it, if there had been such a thing in Spain, but as Campo de Verde said, "In Spain the women paint enough for all the nation." I merely repeat what he said, without vouching for its truth.

While his excellency was waiting to hear the effect of his aid-de-camp's expedition across the bridge, and this took up some time, the company continued to gather into the apartment, and began to talk, drink lemonade, and flirt, as is the custom in Spain, especially in summer. But the chief amusement was the old conde, who ran constantly backwards and forwards between the windows, repeating verses out of the Araucana, for he was a bel esprit, and in his youth was supposed to have written some madrigals on the Lady de dos Hermanas, the celebrated beauty, who afterwards died for love of the Infant Don Pablo. All his quotations had a reference to fire, though it was the fire of love, at which some of the ladies laughed immoderately, for he was a remarkably withered, little old man, with sharp brown eyes, and a voice as shrill and quavering as a dulzana. When his verses were exhausted, he flung himself back again upon the sofa, and putting on a face of the deepest despair, called for coffee. He looked like the caricatures of Frederic of Prussia. At last a noise was heard in the ante-room. "Make way for the aid-de-camp," was the cry. "Por el amor de Dios, make way," said the aid-de-camp; but the crowd was so wedged together, that one would have thought he was making way through the pass of Salinetas, where they say a mule has three turns to make between his head and his tail. At length he came out of the cloud of silk and feathers, and went bowing towards the captain-general. "Cuerpo de todas los Santos, where did you come from?" said the conde. The aid-de-camp was a Biscayan, and being too much in a hurry, he spoke half in his own tongue, and half Castilian, so that scarcely a word of what he said could be understood. All they could learn from the midst of a whole history, was, "Masanasa; they are going to Masanasa; they are at Masanasa; legions of pikes; rows of poplar trees." "You're come from Masanasa!" Now every soul in the room knew that Masanasa was a remarkably pretty village, within a short league of Valencia, but what had made it the burthen of the aid-de-camp's song no one could conceive. The old conde, however, seemed to have conceived it very well, for he danced round the room in a paroxysm between merriment and madness, and after embracing the aid-de-camp, then calling him all the ill names in the camp-vocabulary, and they are a tolerable number, ended by throwing himself on his favourite seat, and, in a low voice, repeating the words, "My child, my Rosanna, querida de mi alma," and a hundred other expressions of sorrow. Don Francisco strove to console him, and the old man thanked him with more civility than usual.

"Oh, my friend," said he, "I see you have the true blood of Spain in your bosom. You feel for distress, and wish to console it. On the night of our landing on the Algerine coast, I—"

Don Francisco looked up, and could scarcely help laughing in his face, but the conde's had such an expression of sorrow, that he suppressed his ridicule. The old man pressed his hand, and proceeded;

"Yes, the night was just such another as this—the San Stefano lay in close to the shore; the guns were double-shot; every thing was in readiness for a broadside, that should blow the batteries into the sea, when the general called me over to him. 'Look at that yellow light,' said he; 'it is the bey's favourite wife's chamber—'"

THE DRAMA.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY-LANE.

On the evening of the twenty-third of February, a new and eccentric piece, called "Past and Present, or the Hidden Treasure," was produced at this theatre. The chief parts as follows: Marquis de St. Victor, Julian (his son,) Count de Florville, Larose (valet to the Marquis,) Celestine. The incident on which the piece is founded has been extracted from that eventful drama the French revolution. The author has exhibited a magnanimous contempt for those obsolete things called the unities in time, place, and person. Whatever success the piece has had, it owes it not to this. The action commences in the year 1789, and (hide thy diminished head, Will Shakspeare! with thy Winter's Tale) only terminates in 1829. The first act consists of one continual scene in the drawing room of the Marquis de St. Victor. The revolution is just on the eve of explosion. The Marquis, foreseeing its troubles, confides the jewels and treasures of his family to a faithful domestic, Larose, who hides them in a secret chamyouth, who curses college and the laws of primogeniture, loves and is beloved by his fair cousin Celestine, and elopes with her, by the advice of the Count de Florville, the piak of French coxcombr. The Count happens, in accordance with the habits of the ancient regime, to be the bridegroom elect of Celestine without knowing it—a family arrangement. His confusion on discovering that he has been accessory to his own disgrace, and the excitement of a large assemblage of the Noblesse at the popular tumults which are heard bursting forth, terminate the first act with considerable effect. Before the curtain rises again, four years are supposed to have passed away. We are introduced to the Conciergerie, where we recognise Florville preserving his foppery unperturbed, the Marquis, and the faithful Larose disguised as a faggot-maker, and plotting the preservation of his master. Julian, after having returned from the army with his budding mustachios on, also becomes temporarily involved in this threatening scene. The efforts of Larose are foiled by a monster, an under-gaoler, well represented by Mr. Webster; and this second part of the piece seems, at its termination, to consign all those for whom we are interested, to inevitable destruction. Time flies now with a velocity unparalleled in the phenomena of dramatic magic. In the twinkling of a drop-scene we pass from 1793 to 1829. We are in Normandy. The Marquis is no more; even Julian is cut off—a General, killed, as we are informed, at the head of his brigade; but Florville, a gay, antiquated sexagenarian, has not as yet shed his blossoms, and Larose totters on the brink of the grave. Ferdinand, a son of Julian, (still Madame Vestris,) appears in love with the granddaughter of one of our first characters. Her father is a rich merchant; he refuses his consent to the union of the lovers, on account of Ferdinand's possessions being comprised in his commission. Larose recognises the scion of his master's house, and, with a last effort of expiring nature, reveals the hidden treasure of the family, and thus produces a happy denouement. It is manifest that, except in the last act, there is but little plot in this piece; nevertheless, the author by a skilful arrangement of incident, keeps alive a constant interest in the passing scene. He owes very much to the excellent acting of those gentlemen who supported the chief parts. Mr. Farren, happy as he is in the delineation of old age, never, perhaps, has given a more consummate specimen of his correct conception of human nature, in its last stage, than he did in this piece. He was enthusiastically applauded in the last act. Mr. Jones was quite at home, and most excellent in Florville. Madame Vestris unsexed herself most felicitously. The success of the piece was unequivocal. Notwithstanding a few hisses, the announcement of its repetition was received with general approbation.

Eng. paper.

LITERARY NOTICES.

LAWRIE TODD.—We have read with much interest and amusement this last work of Mr. Galt, and are not surprised at its popularity. It is said to be an adumbration of the mortal career of a worthy and somewhat eccentric inhabitant of this city, touching whose cognomen (by the way) a singular sort of reserve has been manifested by all our editorial brethren since the appearance of his pseudo biography. Every one who has had any thing to say of Lawrie Todd, has been at pains to intimate the actual hero so particularly as not to be mistaken; yet nobody it seems, has thought it safe, or wise, or prudent, or proper to mention the name of Grant Thorburn. Why this mysterious course has been adopted we are rather at a loss to imagine, for there is nothing related in the book of which Mr. Thorburn has reason to be ashamed; on the contrary, if Mr. Galt has told the whole truth, and nothing of importance but the truth, the subject of his tale may justly look upon Lawrie Todd as an honourable testimony to his own industry, honesty, and perseverance. As a narrative, Lawrie Todd is very entertaining, and abounds with touches of that quaint and quiet humour which constitutes the principal charm of all the distinguished author's writings.

PAUL CLIFFORD.—A new novel under this title, by the author of Pelham, the Disowned, &c. is announced as being in the press of the brothers Harper of this city. A part of it only has yet been received, but the whole, we understand, is to be published simultaneously here and in Europe. An eminent literary gentleman who has examined the work, declares it to be "decidedly the most original of Mr. Bulwer's novels." If this is the case the public may anticipate a rich treat from the forthcoming work, for we know of no one of the modern school of novelists, except its immortal founder, who has given evidence of having entered the fields of fiction better furnished at all points for success, or one who has returned of nature, and deep comprehension of man, than the distinguished author of Devereux.

THE EXILE'S DAUGHTER.—The deaf and dumb poet, James Nack, whose Legend of the Rocks, and other poems, appeared two or three years since, is about publishing a volume, containing the Exile's Daughter, a metrical romance with several minor poems, and a memoir of the author prefixed.

THE LOST HEIR.—This novel—says a late English publication—exhibits a manly vigour of sentiment, and graphic delineation of character, manners, and scenery. The incidents narrated are at once natural and affecting; and the interest which the reader is obliged to assume in the fates of the principal characters, is the result as well of the skilful development of the story as of the occurrences which constitute the body of the narrative. It would be injustice to the author not to observe that the morality is, throughout, of the purest character, and that sentiments of patriotism, the love of freedom, a hatred of oppression, an admiration of virtue, and a deep sympathy for human suffering, break out almost in every page with a freshness and truth which do the highest honour to the author.

MR. GODWIN'S NEW NOVEL.—The main subject of this work is to be found in the fortunes of the son of an English earl, deprived by his uncle of his birthright. The scenes that arise out of this groundwork are, many of them, of a most splendid kind, embracing the manners of numerous countries, and of diversified ranks, occupations, and characters. "Cloudsly" will, perhaps, be considered superior to all the works of the author, excepting only his "Caleb Williams."

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

BEAUTIFUL BARGE.—The last number of the Mechanic's Magazine contains an interesting article on ship building. We have extracted from it the following account of the splendid barge which was recently built in Boston, for a gentleman in Brazil:

"The frame and plank of the boat were oak. The thwarts and gratings, and pannel work above the thwarts, mahogany. The moulding on the outside, to serve as a fender, solid brass. The stanchions that support the wash-boards, the row-locks, rudder-braces, yoke, tiller, pump, and a plate on the stem and stern, are also brass. Every part of the boat was oiled and varnished, and the wash-boards covered with figures executed in bronze and gold. Mahogany mouldings ornamented the pannel work, and the gratings were gilt. The Brazilian arms were executed in bronze and gold, in the richest style, on the cockswain board. An awning extended ten feet from the stern, ornamented with cords and tassels, and supported by brass pillars. Part of the flooring was carpeted. There were two sets of cushions, one covered with the richest crimson damask, the other with moreen. She had two brass boat hooks, one sail, and six oars, the ends of which were covered with brass."

INGENIOUS MECHANISM.—Our brethren in New-England are untiring in their inventions, and truly astonishing in the fertility of their creative genius in the useful arts. The following extract from the United States Gazette, of Philadelphia, offers a pertinent and gratifying instance:

"We witnessed yesterday a wonderful and ingenious piece of mechanism and discovery in the construction of a clock; it possesses the power of winding itself up by the mere change of the atmosphere, and is calculated to go as long as the materials of which it is composed lasts. It makes a beautiful piece of furniture for a parlour, and so simple in its nature, that a child may handle it without causing any derangement to its operations. It has been going upwards of twelve months, and the owner states he will set it in competition, respecting keeping time, with any patent lever watch or clock in the world. The discoverer of it is a plain New-England farmer who had one in operation some time before he made it known to the world."

PARIS ROYAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCE.—At a late sitting of this academy some discussion arose relative to the inquiries made by M. Lachaussee, a clerk in the excise, who lays claim to the discovery of perpetual motion, for which he solicits a pension from the king. The academy, it seems, some time since decided that it would no longer entertain this question, nor that of the quadrature of the circle, nor the trisection of the angle—problems which it considers impossible of solution; and thinking also that it is a waste of the time of men of genius. M. de Boisbertrand submitted to the academy a plan, invented by M. Dupers, an engraver at Conflans, with a view to prevent the forgery of bank notes. The plan consists in the simultaneous application of two dry-stamp-impressions on

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

THE RAMBLER.—NUMBER XIV.

IMITATION.

ALL men are firmly of opinion that they have a will of their own, and nothing vexes them worse than to endeavour to make them sensible of the contrary. The great majority are "led by the nose as easily as asses are," and much easier; yet as they trot along in the wake of some shrewd fellow, who is in turn led by some one still shrewder than himself, they actually imagine they are free-agents, that their opinions are their own, and their actions the result of these opinions. This delusion is universal and very complete, and, (heaven knows the reason) it appears to be the most provoking thing in the world to awaken any one from it. Tell a man plainly that he is a sad profligate, and ten to one but he is proud of the appellation; but tell another that he is an honest well-meaning gentleman, though somewhat liable to be guided by the example of others rather than his own judgment, and he gets into a perfect fury, and asks you what you take him for? A monkey is an imitative animal, but nothing to a man, who is at once the most servile copyist in creation, and a sturdy asserter of his moral independence—a being who tells you it is his pleasure to do so and so, because "every body does so." He sacrifices his ease and convenience to do as other people do; and eats, drinks, and sleeps, not when it suits himself, but when it pleases others to eat, drink, and sleep. The fashion of the hour is a moral despotism, whose omnipotent decrees he dares not dispute, however curious a figure he may cut in obeying its mandates. The effect of this is often particularly singular in consequence of the inappropriateness of the fashion to the individual, or the unhappy attempts of the individual to assimilate with the fashion. In dress, for instance, it is strikingly so. Some lady and gentleman of sufficient notoriety to entitle them to "set the fashion" for the season, array themselves in such garments as they think best adapted to their figure and complexion, and such as will give prominence to the beauties, and throw into shade the defects of each. As soon as they have arranged this to their satisfaction, it becomes "the mode," and the whole tribe of bipeds, great and small, thick and thin, short and tall, judiciously follow their example without any reference to the shape or colour that heaven has made them. You will see a brunette blackening her complexion by bringing it in violent contrast with straw-colour and lilac, because it is the fashion; and a blonde looking sickly and consumptive, by having glaring orange, purple, or dark green, in the vicinity of her delicate skin—you will see a long column of humanity, of no thickness at all, with a broad-brimmed beaver on his head, and a short sporting-jacket on his back that barely suffices to cover the minor portion of his person; and you will see a short, puffy, corpulent individual waddling along in a swallow-tailed coat and steeple crowned hat, all because it is the fashion! Yet these people imagine they have a will of their own.

In literature the imitative principle has been, and is, in full operation, though it is perhaps half intentional and half unconscious. A master-spirit starts from the crowd of men, strikes out some new course, ranges through unexplored and unthought of regions, and there reigns an object of wonder and admiration. Immediately a whole troop of pigmies attempt to tread in his giant footsteps, imitate his faults, exaggerate his defects, and imagine, before they advance one step up the hill of fame, that they are nearly at its summit. It will be in the remembrance of all, when Byron was in the zenith of his glory, what an immense quantity of second hand misanthropy was afloat among the poetsasters; and how they all set to work to draw their own portraits for the amusement of the public, and what a precious set of good-for-nothing vagabonds they made themselves out to be. They were all, according to their own story, made up of splendid errors and useless virtues, and were most unanimously unhappy. It was for a time a most ludicrous evil; for nothing can be more ridiculous than to see a small mind playing the egotist, and describing the agony of its feelings at the same time that it is hunting for a rhyme, and seeing that the line contains the requisite number of syllables. This folly has in a great measure past away, and the Waverley imitation fever, which succeeded, has been much more rational in its motives, and creditable in its results. True, historical novels have become almost as much a drug in the market as fashionable ones. The public is beginning to get tired of the portraits of defunct kings, queens, and courtiers; and the number of great men that have been resuscitated and made to speak in the first person singular, has become alarming. Our novelists are perfect literary alone, unearthed some dozen deceased wits, warriors, and sages, and brought them again on the stage of existence. Both for his own credit and theirs, he had much better let them remain where they were. Many persons, because the great magician, Walter Scott, can raise up the glorious spirits of the past, and make them act and speak as they were wont, think that they can do the same—but the public do not. It is far from pleasant to see these liberties taken with the mighty dead, except by one as mighty as any of them, Shakspeare excepted. Still there has been much talent, learning, and research displayed in works of this description, by Horace Smith, Mr. James, and others, which might have gained for their authors great credit with posterity, as they have already with the present generation, had not their merits been overshadowed by those of their immortal prototype. As it is, they will as surely go to the "oblivious cooks" as that every word of this essay will be forgotten next week by the people who read it this. For our own poor taste, after Sir Walter Scott, in the present age, give us Washington Irving's portraits of great dead men. His Wouter Von Twiller, William Kleift, and Peter Stuyvesant, are three as finished pictures in the fine, quiet, rich old Dutch school as any one need wish to look upon.

But the greatest field for imitation is theatricals, and here it is of the very worst species. The beauties of a great actor are never attempted to be copied; they are too difficult, but any unfortunate peculiarity or bad and vicious habit is seized upon with avidity and fondly cherished. Because John Kemble was troubled with an asthmatic complaint, all the Rollas, Catos, and Hamlets that came for some time after him were likewise troubled with asthma and a short, dry cough; with Macready came the almost ridiculous stateliness of gesture and fastidious arrangement of the garments, without any of his fine qualities; and Kean's fame has been the means of introducing many a young man on the stage, who could do nothing like him but imitate those little Keanisms and physical defects that occasionally disfigured his beautiful intellectual acting. A would-be vocalist, with the voice of a raven, thinks himself a good deal like Braham, because in singing he can hold his hat precisely as he does, and has succeeded in catching a few of that gentleman's peculiarly awkward gestures. Talking of singing—is the prevailing admiration of Italian music and performances counterfeit or real, or a little of both? Is it in imitation of the English who imitate the French in this respect, or is it a genuine indigenous feeling? The Italian is a noble school of music, and it would be gratifying to perceive a gradual relish for it taking place; but it is apt to create mistrust to see the exuberance of admiration expressed for it all of a sudden by a large body of people, nineteenth-twentieths of whom are neither familiar with the music nor the language; and we are afraid there is some truth in the anecdote now whispered round the city, of a party of musical cognoscenti having been thrown into a fit of enthusiasm by what they supposed to be an Italian gentleman's manner of giving a composition of Cimarosa's, but which, words and air, eventually turned out to be a genuine Welch ditty, howled out by one Taffy ap Shenkin, of Glamorganshire! Certain it is, that many things pass off with great clat when sung in a foreign language by Signors, Signorinas, or Signorinas, which would sound very vilely issuing from the mouth of plain Mr. Jobson, Mrs. Brown, or Miss Dobbs. The blunt tradesman had really some reason to be astonished when on inquiring if "Signorina" did not literally mean in Italian "great singer," he was given to understand that it was merely equivalent to the simple English word "Miss." We recollect a gentleman of the name of Comer, formerly of this city, who used to sing an Italian air with American words to it—"When the banners of freedom are waving"—without producing any marked effects; but no sooner did the same gentleman replace the Italian words, "Non piu andria," than it was instantly recognised as something extremely fine, and vociferously encored. Now, without meaning to undervalue talented foreigners who reach these shores, it is probable there is no small quantity of affectation in the great admiration expressed for them, and that the majority applaud without having any definite idea on the subject, in imitation of the few who are supposed to know. Such foreigners are, at the same time, both overrated and not sufficiently appreciated—overrated as a whole, and not appreciated in detail, for what is really meritorious. Our harsh northern dialect may not be so well adapted to musical composition as that of the "sweet south," but it does not follow that every Italian composition or singer must of necessity be superlatively fine; and allowing our general inferiority, a song in a language which a man understands, will always, affectation aside, be more grateful to his ear than further than the ear, while the other, through the medium of the understanding, reaches the heart, and any song that does so is worth twenty others that do not. If people would take the trouble of consulting their own judgments, feelings, and common sense on such subjects, instead of being carried away by vague ideas and learned-looking words, they would find it much to their interest; as it is, they let others inoculate them with opinions which in time they come to believe their own. C.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

PORTRAITS OF CELEBRATED CHARACTERS.

ROBERT BLOOMFIELD.

THE author of the Farmer's Boy may, with great propriety, be classed among the first in the catalogue of modern poets, who have proved the omnipotence of uneducated and unassisted genius. With an education of the most limited kind, with acquirements derived only from an acquaintance with nature in her simplest form, and struggling under every possible disadvantage of poverty, and the necessary attention he was compelled to devote to a servile and laborious employment, Bloomfield has left behind a proof that all these combined untoward circumstances could not crush and, although his learning was chiefly derived from the capacious volume of nature, rather than from the classical tomes perused by more gifted poets, beneath the portico of science; yet this "uninstructed child of song" has distinctly proved the axiom, "that to be a poet a man must be created one."

"The divinity stirring within him;"

Robert Bloomfield was born at the village of Honington, in Suffolk, England, on the third of December, 1766. His father was a mechanic, and his mother held the situation of school-mistress in his native village. To this maternal relative Bloomfield was indebted for the little education he possessed, excepting two or three months' tuition in writing, which he received from a master in the vicinity of his birth-place. At the early age of eleven he was placed with his mother's brother-in-law, a respectable farmer, residing in an adjacent village, in the capacity of a farmer's boy. In this lowly situation our poet acquired that intimate acquaintance with rural occupations and manners, the display of which is prevalent through all his writings. Here, like the celebrated Burns, his perceptions, if not improved by education, were at least untrammelled by its dogmas; science and philosophy did not seduce him into an imitation of its most distinguished votaries, nor did its prescribed rules and set formulas cramp his young genius in its first incipient flights into the regions which his young imagination early soared to attain. The sensibility of his soul was awakened by the charms of nature, which gave fervour to his thoughts and distinctness to his ideas. At the age of fifteen we find him leaving his rural employment, on account of his physical incapacities for this laborious occupation. His now widowed mother was compelled, in this exigency, to place him with one of his elder brothers, who was then residing in London, following the business of a ladies' shoemaker, and who offered to instruct our young poet in the "mysteries" of his calling.

Transported to the great metropolis, and engaged in the laborious occupation we have named, Bloomfield continued in this situation for several years. In the early part of this period his most common occupation is described as being engaged in reading the newspapers to the workmen employed by his brother. When thus occupied he frequently met with words that he could not understand, and an old dictionary was bought for his use, by a constant reference to which he soon attained a greater command of language, and could readily comprehend the meaning of difficult passages. His knowledge of phraseology and enunciation was also increased by a constant attendance at a dissenting place of worship in the neighbourhood, the pulpit of which was then filled by an eloquent and celebrated preacher. These advantages, with the aid of a few books, such as a History of England, a British Traveller, and a London Magazine, formed the only resources for information which he then possessed.

During this time he is described as showing a strong predilection for poetical composition. The poet's corner in the newspapers had the greatest share of his attention; and it was known that he occasionally furnished stanzas, which were registered in this favourite spot. An intimacy formed at this period with a Scotchman brought him acquainted with the works of Thomson, the author of the Seasons, which he read with avidity and delight. From a perusal of the Seasons not exhausted the subject, and that "the rural occupation and business of the fields, the dairy, and the farm-yard" would still furnish sufficient materials for an original and independent poem. A dispute which occurred about this time between the masters and the journeymen shoemakers, suspended his employment, and till these disputes were settled, his old master and uncle invited him to his house in the country; the invitation was accepted, and in the fields where his infant mind had first imbibed its conceptions, he experienced a renovation of his original feelings, and fitted himself to become the writer of the Farmer's Boy.

In about two months he returned to London, and resumed his former employment, at which he continued until his arrival at the age of manhood, shortly after which he married the daughter of a boat-builder, attached to the dock-yard at Woolwich.

The early years of this marriage were in some degree embittered by the cares of livelihood, and the sickness of a young family; still we find him occasionally dedicating a part of his leisure time to his devotion for the muses. On the recovery of his strength he resumed his labours in the garret of the house where he then resided, in London; and here, amidst all the din and bustle made by six or seven workmen, pursuing the same trade as his own, did Bloomfield compose the FARMER'S BOY, putting it to paper as he found opportunity! He is represented as committing fifty or a hundred lines at a time to memory, before writing them down; and such was the strength of this faculty, that the two last divisions of this poem, Winter, and great part of Autumn, were entirely completed before a single verse was put on paper.

When the manuscript was finished, it passed through several hands before it was examined by any person of sufficient judgment to appreciate its worth. At length it was referred, through the medium of a friend, to the famous Capel Loft, esq., and in the year 1800 it was published, through the influence and under the patronage of that gentleman.

The publication of the Farmer's Boy proved eminently successful, and an incredible number of copies were sold in a short space of time. It attracted the attention of the most exalted personages in the kingdom, and many of the most eminent literary characters awarded the meed of approbation to its author. Presents were bestowed upon him in abundance, which, together with the profits derived from the sale of his work, enabled him to emerge from the obscurity of his former situation, and to take a small house in the City-road, near London. One of the greatest pleasures Bloomfield derived from the success of his work, was the opportunity of presenting a copy to his mother, accompanied by a portion of his profits, and the testimonials of its excellence from the critics of the day; a fact that speaks highly for the amiable character he is represented as possessing. In the year 1802, he published his Rural Tales; and shortly afterwards a small volume, bearing the title of Wild Flowers; these added considerably to his reputation. His familiar and picturesque descriptions of nature gave a charm to his poetry, which rendered it highly attractive to every class of readers, and has established his reputation as one of the first "simple poets" of his day.

The popularity thus obtained served to recommend him to the Duke of Grafton, who placed him in the Seal-office, in the Inner Temple, London, where his duty was to receive money for stamps on wills, &c. This employment did not suit the ardent mind of the poet, and he relinquished the situation after holding it a few years. The sale of his works, and a small property inherited in right of his wife, furnished ample means for his moderate wishes; he retired to the country, where he lived in privacy until the time of his death, in 1823.

H*

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

GREटना-GREEN.

THIS spot, so long famous for clandestine marriages, is a small village in the parish of Graitney, situate in Dumfriesshire, in Scotland, from whence it derives its proper name of Graitney-Green, and which has been anglicised into the appellation it now generally bears. Its contiguity to the English border, and the singular high priest of Hymen, (who, time immemorial, has been a blacksmith,) that forges the chains to bind the numerous votaries who flock thither for "a cast of his priestly office," have led to some erroneous impressions respecting the privileges attached to this celebrated place. Agreeably to the Scottish law, the simple declaration of two persons before a competent witness, that they take though it is not considered a regular one; and, if neither fraud nor deception is used by the contracting parties, the ceremony (if ceremony it may be termed) is to all intents and purposes equally binding, as if performed agreeably to the established forms of recognised church government. With this explanation, therefore, it will readily be understood that Greटना-Green owes its popularity only to some particular circumstances, which it is now impossible exactly to trace. It is however supposed that its contiguity to the borders, first induced some individuals to select it for the performance of a marriage contract, in conformity with the Scottish law, and the facilities of reaching it from England, in time, gave it that importance which it now holds. The far-famed blacksmith acts only as the witness on the occasion, and in fact performs no other duty than might be executed by any other competent witness, selected for the occasion. These few preparatory explanations may serve to illustrate the incidents I am about to relate.

Several years since, it fell to my lot to be engaged in a runaway-match to this famous resort for English clandestine marriages, not as a principal, my good reader, but only in the less important capacity of an accessory to the plan. As the adventure possessed some degree of interest, a detail of it may serve to amuse, and will also furnish a correct description of the ceremonies used by the self-elected clerical functionary, who officiated on the occasion.

The hero of my tale, and by whom I was drawn into a participation of this irregular proceeding, chanced to be an old class-mate at school, and a fellow-student in the same lawyer's office, in London. I shall designate him by a name which, in place of his real one, will better illustrate his character than any laboured description of mine could portray. Tom Ardourly (for such shall be his cognomen) was the son of a wealthy London tradesman, who by industry and application had acquired a large fortune, when fortunes were the sure results of such praiseworthy efforts to attain them. Tom was an only child, and consequently the darling of his parents. The quickness of his parts, and the hilarity of his disposition, indeed might have rendered him a favourite with less interested personages than the honest couple who claimed him as their offspring, added to which, nature had not been a niggard in furnishing him with those graces which find certain access to "fair ladies' hearts," and when to these qualifications were subjoined the certainty of his ultimately becoming the heir to a property which was generally estimated at a plum, there can be no doubt that Tom Ardourly was considered both by his male and female acquaintance as "a marvellous proper man." Tom and I had from infancy been inseparable companions and sworn friends, and although no two individuals could possibly differ more in temperament than we did, yet this very difference was the bond which cemented our acquaintance. My quiet habits and taciturn disposition was a sober relief to the exuberance of his vivid imagination and dashing manners, and in the course of our intimacy preserved him from many unpleasantnesses, in which his gay and thoughtless conduct was continually involving him, and I consequently became his mentor and adviser. Being nearly of an age, we were at the period I have named, just closing the term of noviciate in the dry study of the law; I, from necessity, was lagging hard to pass a successful examination; Tom, as usual, was depending upon chance to carry him through the ordeal, and caring little on the subject, knowing his future ample means. Thus circumstanced, I had not been so frequently his companion in the usual routine of amusements and engagements, which served to fill up our leisure hours; this, however, did not prevent me from observing that an alteration had lately taken place in his manners, which I could not comprehend; his spirits were much depressed, and there was evidently something preying on his mind. The close application I had been giving to study at first made me conjecture that he had been similarly occupied; this I soon found was not the case, for both occupying chambers in the Temple, under the same roof, our servants were, as a matter of course, intimates, and I learned, in the course of some domestic discussions, that Mr. Ardourly was scarcely ever at home: that he was falling into "a deep melancholy," as my learned informant assured me, and that there was great reason to believe that a lady was the cause of this sudden change; more this deponent knew not. On the morning succeeding this information, I was put in possession of the whole facts of the case. I was scarcely seated over the ponderous tomes, that were now my principal companions, when Ardourly came in, and threw himself into a chair opposite me, with an air of embarrassment and agitation. A pause of some moments succeeded, which I at length broke, by inquiring how he purposed spending the next day? He abruptly answered

"Oh!" returned I with alacrity, "that is exactly the arrangement I wish; we'll drive over to the C—'s," a family residing a few miles from town, where we were on terms of intimacy.

"Yes," replied he, "that happens precisely to be the place where I wish you to go first; but you must take a longer drive than to the C—'s to-morrow, if you wish to oblige me, and are the friend I think you."

"Why, what do you mean?" said I.

"The plain fact is this, Howard," returned he, "I wish you to go with me to Greटना-Green to-morrow!"

"In the name of every thing ridiculous, what are we to do at Greटना-Green?" was my half-indignant and half-laughable inquiry.

"Simply to see me married," was the quiet response.

I now became somewhat alarmed, either for the intellects or for the situation of my visitor; he however quickly silenced my fears by adding, in a serious tone,

"Howard, you have ever proved yourself a firm friend; I have never before had any concealments with you, and I am now going to test the extent of your regard for me. You know Ellen C—?" A nod was my affirmative. "Well, Ellen is to be the companion of our journey. We have long loved each other, and it was only the pledge I had given her not to declare our situation, which could have induced me to keep the knowledge of it from you; you know, also, the pride of her family; the sprig of nobility they can claim as their connexion, induces them to look upon tradesmen with contempt. They have refused my addresses to Ellen, and she has, in consequence, yielded to my solicitations to make a stolen match, with the stipulation that you sanction it by your presence. Your influence with her father, and the high opinion he has of your character, induces her to suppose that you can obtain a reconciliation between us, and which will be easier effected by your becoming a party in the transaction. Ellen is not of age, and Greटना-Green is our only resource; she will meet us by daybreak to-morrow morning, accompanied by her maid, near her father's house, where I have promised to be in waiting, accompanied by you, and provided with all things necessary for our journey."

Here he paused, and then added, "Have I promised too much in your name, Howard?"

"What says your father to the match?" was my evasive reply to this interrogation.

"Oh, the generous old boy knows all, and enjoys the scheme amazingly. I have introduced Ellen to him and to my mother; they are delighted with her. You are aware of my old dad's opinion of the superiority of wealth and independence over aristocratic poverty, and he relishes the plan of punishing the pride of old C—; and promises, if we effect it, to settle a handsome maintenance on me immediately after the marriage is solemnized."

Extravagant as the whole affair certainly was, I could not resist the importunities he now plied me with; the assent of old Ardourly reconciled me to the undertaking, and I well knew the match was every way unexceptionable for Miss C—, and had but few doubts that a little reflection would reconcile her father, soothed as he would be by the future prospects of his son-in-law elect.

Having settled the preliminaries, we soon arranged the necessary preparations, and before daybreak the ensuing morning we were at the appointed spot, with the plain carriage belonging to Ardourly's father, post horses, and a tried servant of the family, who was to accompany us on our expedition. Tom's impatience may readily be imagined. A thousand fears gave an impetus to his usually vivid imagination, and I had much difficulty in preventing him from proceeding to Mr. C—'s house, in search of his fair mistress. The appearance of Miss C—, and her attendant abigail, at length subdued his alarms, and we conveyed the young lady, almost fainting with agitation, to the carriage, and drove off at a furious rate, on the great north road to "Auld Reekie." A short time restored our lovely charge to some degree of tranquillity, and I received the acknowledgments of grateful thanks for my compliance with her request, from a pair of the sweetest lips that nature ever gave to the most favoured of her children, accompanied with a becoming modesty, rendered more touching by the peculiar delicacy of her situation. The weather was delightful, the roads good, and Tom in his happiest mood—gay and exulting as became a favoured and happy bridegroom. A few fears accompanied us the first stages of our journey; but on the second day, with the promised goal almost in view, nothing but prospects of a happy termination to the adventure entered our imaginations; for I must confess I had become deeply interested in the final result which at that period was kept by the worthy vulcan, who acted in the treble capacity of host, blacksmith, and parson. We found him a shrewd, intelligent fellow, fully alive to the exigencies of our case, and cheerfully prepared to further our views. An apartment was immediately prepared for Miss C—, and the necessary materials for ablution, &c. were furnished for the intended bridegroom and myself. The short space of half an hour found us all assembled in the well-sanded parlour of the inn, and ready for the important ceremony. The bride had relinquished her riding-habit for a simple muslin robe of purest white; her abigail, also, was arrayed in the same materials; and was really a very useful auxiliary on the occasion, in supporting her young mistress during the somewhat trying situation in which she was placed. The clerical blacksmith was now summoned, and the worthy functionary made his appearance, attended by a sturdy chap, who looked as if he had just been summoned from the "smithy," bearing a huge volume, which we afterwards found was for the insertion of our respective names, as witnesses to the ceremony. Worthy Saunders M^T—, who officiated as clergyman on the occasion, was more seemly in his exterior; a white cassock, thrown over his usual dress, gave an importance and dignity to his figure, which certainly was not the most prepossessing. The parties were now arranged, and we were given to understand that a portion of the form used in the episcopal church was to be read over, beginning at that part where the minister demands of the respective parties whether they take each other for man and wife, and ending with the separate declarations of the contracting parties, agreeably to the same form, "I, M. take thee N.," &c. This being duly gone through, the young couple were declared lawfully united; the ponderous book I have mentioned was produced, and we separately wrote our signatures to a few lines, purporting that on such a day the parties therein named had taken each other for man and wife. Thus ended the ceremony. A handsome douceur was the clergyman's fee, who quickly doffed his gown, and busily assisted in placing a substantial supper on the table, to which I alone did justice, and after pledging the happy pair in a magnum of excellent claret, I left them to seek the public room of our hotel, and to have a little chat with the important personage who was its chief attraction. I found the honest blacksmith deeply engaged in a bowl of hot toddy, and surrounded by a few select magnates of the village, drinking success and happiness to the couple who had lately become one by his assistance. My wish to join the convivial group was readily acceded to, and we soon became as familiar as good feeling and good liquor make men under every difference of relative positions. Our host boasted of the importance of his functions, and enumerated the many matches he had cemented, which, without such aid, never could have taken place, and told many laughable anecdotes that had occurred in his house in the way of his profession; and as the liquor began to operate, his previous reserve on the profits arising from his clerical employments became relaxed, and I gathered sufficient information to establish the truth of what our worthy entertainer had before hinted at, that he laid by a pretty "nest egg," out of the profits of his employment; and to which he added, that "a thousand, or it may be, twal hundred pounds sterling money would na kiver the incomings in the course of a year."

About midnight I left the jovial party, still deeply engaged in their libations, and sought that repose necessary for undertaking the rapid journey to town, which we had arranged to commence early on the ensuing morning.

The sun had scarcely glanced his first beams across the Solway Frith, when I was roused from a sound and refreshing sleep by the deep notes of Saunders M^T—, inquiring whether "I was na stirring yet?" and begging permission to "speak a few words wi' me;" which being obtained, he was quickly at my bed-side. No traces of the "deep drinking" of the preceding night were now visible, he soon entered upon his business, which was to caution me on the subject of his communicative information respecting the profits he had made in his clerical capacity.

"You ken, sir," continued he, "you Englishers hae a proverb, that 'when the liquor's in the wit's out;' I wasna preceesely mysel the last nicht, but gin I can trust my memory the morn, I taulked a wheen trash about the siller that I shouldna weel like to hae spoken of; sae, sir, you'll mair than oblige me to keep a close sough anent the matter."

I promised not to betray his confidence, and the blacksmith retired, well pleased to find so ready a compliance with his wishes. He has long been gathered to his fathers, so that I do not betray the trust reposed in me by the present narration. There is little more to add to my detail that can interest after the adventures at Gretna. Mrs. Ardourly, junior, was received with affection by her new father and mother-in-law; and the joint interference of myself and some tried friends of Mr. C—, soon arranged matters amicably with that gentleman, who was fully aware that his daughter might have made a much worse match. The marriage ceremony was duly performed agreeably to the rites of the episcopal church, and a full gathering of the respective families and friends of the parties graced it by their presence. My friend Tom has sobered down to a very creditable domestic man, and enjoys a fair practice in London; where, in my last visit to the metropolis, I saw him, and found him surrounded by a goodly number of young Ardourlys, with whom and his now matronly spouse, I enjoyed many pleasant hours, in recounting our youthful adventures, amongst which the most prominent was our trip to Gretna-Green. D.

CONTENTMENT.

Of all the blessings which it has pleased the Omnipotent to bestow on us, the creatures of his will, that of contentment must rank pre-eminent. The prince is as susceptible of its beneficial effects as the peasant. Divest the former of it, and of what avail is all the luxurious grandeur which surrounds him? Let the latter possess it, and he will be happy in the midst of poverty and toil.

But how shall we attain this inestimable treasure? Are we poor? Let us use all the just means within our reach of acquiring the antidote for this (generally considered) tremendous evil. There are few, perhaps, in this happy country, who by a few years of industry, perseverance, and economy, do not accumulate all that is sufficient for the moderate requirements of our nature. Do you wish for more? Let me advise you—restrain the pursuit; contentment will oftener be found in the cottage than in the palace. Have our views in life been completely frustrated, our most sanguine hopes disappointed? Hard, indeed, is the lot of that man whose case this description suits; but there is a sovereign specific at hand. Will it remedy the evil if we repine at our loss? How many years of sorrow and anguish are sufficient entirely to eradicate this grievance? Rest assured nothing short of the term of our natural lives would be equal to it; the result would fully demonstrate the fact, that instead of ameliorating our condition by grief, we had augmented the evil by the production of sickness and disease, the invariable attendants on sorrow and discontent. Let us, therefore, improve all the means we possess, leave the result to Providence, and above all other earthly considerations, strive for contentment.

THE TWO GAS-LAMPS.

A correspondent informs us that he wishes, and feels himself perfectly competent, to conduct the editorial department of any party political journal devoted to the interests of the people. He sends us the following for insertion as a specimen of his abilities, and desires that after its publication all application to secure his services may be addressed "James Sniggs, Harman-street, New-York." We were not before aware of the fact on which he animadverts, namely, that the mayor of this city has, for an unknown quantity of years, been allowed two lamps before his door; but we were immediately struck with the enormity of the case, and fully concur in our correspondent's cool and philosophical view of the subject.—Ed. Mir.

Exclusive privileges!—Fellow-citizens look out!!—The old federal leaven is not extinct. Though the overwhelming tide of democratic principles has broken down the feeble barriers of federalism that opposed the majestic energies of the people, still the lurking seeds of aristocracy, like the whale from the depths of the Pacific ocean, will occasionally rise to view; the monster, however, has only to show itself to be instantaneously harpooned by that vigilant palladium of the rights and liberties of man—the public press. We are not one of those who start at trifles, but when we see an open and unblushing assumption of exclusive privileges by the first magistrate in the first city of the first state of the first country of the terrestrial globe, in having two lamps put before his door when no other citizen has more than one, and many citizens no lamp at all—and when we know that this is done with money raised by taxation from the people—and moreover that such proceedings are countenanced by the votes of a corrupt corporation, we cannot but tremble for the purity of the institutions of our beloved country, and feel that the time has arrived when it is our duty to speak out, as guardians of the public weal, boldly and fearlessly. Some persons may say that one lamp more or less can be but of little consequence, but we would tell such shallow pretenders to reason—such

so. We recur to first principles, and boldly affirm, without fear of contradiction, that the mayor's enjoying the exclusive privilege of two gas-lamps is essentially aristocratic, and strikes at the fundamental and elementary principles of republicanism and equality. Such things may be tolerated in enslaved and blood-stained Europe, but not in the new world where man walks abroad in the incalculable majesty of his intellect. Who is the mayor, or what is he more than others, that he, forsooth, should have two gas-lamps? Is he not the creature of the people? Is he not elected by the people, the only true source of legitimate power? And is it to be endured that the servant should have a double portion of light while many of the sovereign people themselves are in total darkness? Forbid it, shades of Jefferson and La Fayette! How forcibly in treating of such a question does the sublime apostrophe of the poet strike upon the imagination unclouded and unsaturated by the mists and vapours of monarchical or aristocratical prejudice:

"Thy spirit, Independence, let me share,
Lord of the lion heart and eagle eye!
Thy steps I'll follow with my bosom bare,
Nor heed the storm that howls along the sky!"

and in the spirit of that glorious apostrophe we exclaim, "Perish all gas-lamps from the face of the earth, and oil-lamps into the bargain, sooner than submit to the slightest innovation in the mighty heir-loom of freedom bequeathed to us by the immortal heroes of '78." B.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

NECESSITY.

THE following is an affecting instance of the extremity to which a man may be driven by want and misery. A gentleman being stopped in the night in a street by a man who demanded his purse in a very determined manner, at once delivered it to him. "How much money is there in it?" demanded the robber. "I know not," was the answer. Upon which the thief opened the purse, took out ten francs, and returned the rest to its owner. Surprised by this extraordinary proceeding, the gentleman followed the man at a distance till he saw him enter a baker's shop, which he in a very few minutes left again. The gentleman then went and made inquiry of the baker, who informed him that the man in question having become indebted to him ten francs for bread, he had refused to give any more credit till that sum was paid, which had just been brought him. After some further inquiries, the gentleman having discovered the lodgings of his assailant, went there with the intention of offering relief; but he had scarcely entered the miserable garret when the poor fellow, imagining he was on the point of being arrested, threw himself out of the window, and was taken up lifeless! French paper.

POOR LITTLE JANE.

There is not a flower that blooms in the valley,
Or heath, or the mountain, a stranger to me;
Each morning at dawn, with my basket I sally,
To gather fresh nosegays, light-hearted and free.
I cull fragrant posies of lilies and roses,
And every sweet flow'ret that modestly blows,
I've rue for gay rovers, hearts-ease for true lovers,
And bachelor's buttons for testy old beaux.
O! lay out a penny with poor little Jenny,
Nor let me solicit your kindness in vain,
I've sweet pretty posies of lilies and roses,
Come buy them, O! buy them of poor little Jane.

In winter when tempests are dreadfully blowing,
And every green meadow is covered with snow,
I trip to the village, my locks wildly flowing,
To ask of the rich what they choose to bestow.
In search of fair flowers to deck ladies' bosoms,
I traverse the mountains, the valleys, and glades;
And oft are my rambles impeded by brambles,
When seeking wild wormwood for pettish old maids.
O! lay out a penny with poor little Jenny,
Nor let me solicit your kindness in vain,
I've sweet pretty posies of lilies and roses,
Come buy them, O! buy them of poor little Jane.

RUSSIAN HIGH LIFE.

Private letters from St. Petersburg, of the fifteenth of February, contain the following account of a splendid entertainment given to the Emperor Nicholas and the imperial family, by the Duke de Montemart, ambassador of France:

"On the fifth his excellency gave a grand ball, which was honoured by the presence of the emperor and empress, the Grand Duke Michael, Prince Albert of Prussia, the duke of Wirtemburgh and his two sons, and four hundred persons of the first distinction. The Grand Dutchess Helena was prevented from attending by indisposition, but sent to express guests, except the military officers, who, in Russia, never quit their regimentals, have been accustomed to appear in court dresses, but the emperor, to give a further testimony of his esteem for his august ally, not only gave orders that all his suite should be in their full dresses, but that they should wear the ribbons of their respective orders; his majesty himself and the grand duke displaying the cordon blue. The empress deigned to open the ball by dancing a polonaise with the ambassador. She afterwards granted the same honour to the ambassadors of England and Austria. Her majesty subsequently condescended to take the Baron de Bourgoing for her partner in a French contra-dance. At one o'clock the supper tables, sumptuously spread for two hundred persons, were displayed. That destined for the empress was distinct from the rest, and laid for sixteen persons, including Prince Albert, the ambassadors and ambassadresses of England and Austria, the ladies of honour, and the ladies of the chief dignitaries of the empire. A similar table was reserved for the emperor, but his majesty declined taking his seat, preferring his usual custom of making a tour of the rooms, and addressing himself with gracious condescension to the company. Towards the end of the supper, his majesty went up to the empress, and calling the Duke de Montemart, filled a glass of champagne and drank, in the most delicate and flattering terms, to the health of the king of France, in which he was joined by the empress and Prince Albert. After supper, dancing was resumed. The emperor, empress, and Prince Albert, retired at three o'clock. The next morning, the ambassador being on horseback by the side of the emperor, when viewing the entrance into the city of a brigade of infantry of the guard, his majesty repeated the expressions of the satisfaction he had felt in being the guest of him whom he had received in his tent beyond the Danube, and on the borders of the Black Sea.

English paper.

THE QUILTING.

The day is set, the ladies met,
And at the frame are seated;
In order placed they work in haste,
To get the quilt completed.
While fingers fly, their tongues they ply,
And animate their labours,
By counting beaux, discussing clothes,
Or talking of their neighbours.

"Dear, what a pretty frock you've on—"
"I'm very glad you like it,"
"I'm told that Miss Micomicon
Don't speak to Mr. Micate;"
"I saw Miss Bell the other day,
Young Green's new gig adorning;"
"What keeps your sister Ann away?"
"She went to town this morning."

"'Tis time to roll!"—"my needle's broke,"
"So Martin's stock is selling;"
"Louisa's wedding gown's bespoke,"
"Lend me your scissors, Ellen;"
"That match will never come about,"
"Now don't fly in a passion;"
"Hair puffs they say are going out,"
"Yes, curls are all the fashion."

The quilt is done, the tea begun,
The beaux are all collecting;
The table's cleared, the music heard,
His partner each selecting.
The merry band in order stand,
The dance begins with vigour,
And rapid feet the measure beat,
And trip the mazy figure.

Unheeded fly the minutes by,
Old time himself seems dancing;
Till night's dull eye is oped to spy
The steps of morn advancing;
Then closely stowed, to each abode
The carriages go tilting;
And many a dream has for its theme,
The pleasures of the quilting.

SINGULAR CIRCUMSTANCE.

The marquis of Hertford is likely to come into possession of a very large property in a rather singular manner. Just after his birth a rich old gentleman, residing in the neighbourhood, was making a settlement of property by entail, when, it being necessary to insert the name of some person as remainder, he directed that of the above nobleman, whose birth he had just seen announced in the newspapers, to be written down. At that time there were so many intervening claimants that no one supposed there was the slightest probability of the property falling to the remainder; but all are now dead, except one; and there is, according to present appearances, little doubt of the noble marquis eventually receiving a very

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Subscribers who intend to remove on the first of May will please leave early notification at the office of publication.

Association to aid industrious females.—It is matter of serious doubt if, in the whole range of society, a class can be found whose services are so ill requited as those of labouring females. To this iniquitous and cruel habit may be traced unnumbered misfortunes and many grievous vices. This comparatively helpless portion of the human family, many of whom have seen better days, and some have enjoyed affluence, are almost daily exposed to privations and sufferings which the rougher sex disregard, and to which a large portion of their own, especially those who have it in their power to assist others, but who are either too proud or too slothful to exercise acts of kindness, are unpardonably remiss. In this respect we make no reservation in saying, that an awful sin lies at the doors of some of us. The duty which it is our lot to perform has afforded us many, very many opportunities of being deeply impressed with the solemnity of the truth. People do not reflect, that in the organization of society, and more particularly in the distribution of its rewards and benefices, the female voice is seldom heard; for it is not in their province to be clamorous, nor is it in their nature to utter many complaints. But we must be permitted to say, that we have often surveyed with astonishment, not unmingled with emotions of indignation and pity, the evidence of these things in the tear that trickled on the widow's cheek, or that started into the eye of youth and beauty, when their stinted compensation was placed in their hands, very frequently wholly inadequate to the humblest demands; this, too, after a week's patient labour. We feel well assured, that of the many thousands of females who are compelled to support themselves by persevering industry—allowing for losses, sickness, and detentions—their stipend would not exceed, on the average, a dollar and a half to each; and in a multitude of cases, let it be remembered, this comprises widows with children. What kind of accommodations or sustenance can be procured by such slender means we pretend not to determine; but thus much we say, that we view it as a stain on the community, and that it ought to be removed, by the prompt and energetic action of those who have the ability to do it. And the incentive ought to be none the less strong, when it is known that some of those who now suffer the extremes of poverty were once enabled to put on as lofty a mien as others who would now, perhaps, regard them with disdain. But let none of us so far forget ourselves as to offer insult to those who suffer under the decrees of Providence. The least observation will show to any one the constant mutability of all human things; and that riches take to themselves wings and flee away.

We had thought that these remarks would not be deemed impertinent as introductory to the important object we have in view, and that is, to call the attention of our fair readers to a plan which we hope may prove successful, of making a vigorous effort to bring about a reformation in the harsh customs of society, which deprive worthy and industrious females, most of whom are orphans or widows, of a fair and just reward for their labour. How can it be expected that the morals of such persons should continue uncontaminated, when they feel themselves the victims of fixed and flagrant oppression? Is it wonderful that some should go astray? Or is it not much more wonderful, that we daily witness, under circumstances of such severity, the most exemplary and irreproachable conduct? We are all of us too prone to cast unkind reflections for slight aberrations from the strict line of duty, when under the influence of similar causes we might have shown even less self-command.

The association here referred to was suggested by a gentleman from Philadelphia, long distinguished for his noble and generous feelings, not less than for his enlightened views and eminent usefulness. A number of ladies, conspicuous for their excellence and purity of character, and well known as the ornaments of society, have, as we understand, most commendably resolved to put their spirits into this magnanimous scheme, and push it to its consummation. Here, indeed, is a field for splendid action, and for the exercise of the noblest virtues; and the appeal is made to every generous and sympathetic heart, to unite in the good work, and extend to it all the aid that means, either liberal or humble, can be made to produce. We conclude by asking the reader's attention to the following summary, copied from a collection of valuable essays, recently published in Philadelphia, on this interesting subject:

tion of the lists of subscribers to the different benevolent institutions, I feel warranted in stating—

"That they derive but a slender portion of their support from the wealthiest part of our citizens.

"That their support is chiefly derived from the middle classes of society, and bears but a very small portion to the wealth and population of the city, or to the claims of distress."

"That the idea that every person, able and willing to work, can procure employment, is radically wrong—as there are great numbers of persons of both sexes, particularly females, who eagerly seek work, and cannot find employment.

"That the charge so frequently alleged against the poor, that their distress and wretchedness arises from their idleness and worthlessness, however true as to a small proportion of them, is utterly destitute of foundation as regards the majority.

"That it is impossible for a woman dependent on her needle, and employed on coarse work, and also for a spooler, when encumbered with children, or even without, to support human nature by the miserable wages they receive—and in many cases the wages of males are reduced so low as to render it impossible for a man with a family to lay by any provision for times of sickness or want of employment.

"That it is a great error to suppose our charitable societies encourage idleness and profligacy; for they produce a contrary effect in almost every case, by preventing the depression and ruin, and consequent degradation, of the poor.

"That if each of our wealthy individuals subscribed to all of them, it would be but a very slender sacrifice for the public good, and bear a small proportion to the claims of society on him.

"That the low rate of female wages, not more than one-third of what is earned by men for similar work, is discreditable to human nature—pernicious to the best interests of society—a fertile source of misery, immorality and profligacy—and loudly calls for a remedy.

"That the provident, and all other societies which give employment to the poor, ought to pay adequate wages, so as to set a proper example to individuals—and, so far as regards shirts and pantaloons, that the price ought to be raised at once to eighteen cents.

"That unless they adopt this plan, or one similar, they inflict nearly as much injury as they confer benefit.

"That a reformation of the horrible oppression under which the seamstresses, spinners, spoolers, &c. groan, cannot be hoped for, unless ladies will come forward with decision, and use their influence to rescue their sex from the prostrate situation in which those unfortunate women are placed.

"That it would be misplaced delicacy or timidity which should induce them to hesitate in the performance of so paramount an act of justice."

Birth place of Columbus.—An interesting discovery has lately been made at Genoa, which seems finally to fix upon that city the glory of having given birth to Christopher Columbus. An original letter has been found in the archives of the old bank of St. George, addressed to the magistrate of St. George, and dated Seville, April 2, 1502; the object of which is to direct his son, Don Diego, to devote one-tenth of his income to the diminution of the tax on corn, wine, and other necessities of life in the city of Genoa; a practice which was at that period not uncommon among the wealthy inhabitants of that city.

Madame Lebrun.—It is stated in the Paris papers, that Madame Lebrun, the celebrated painter, lately gave a fancy ball, which was attended by persons of all nations remarkable in science, arts, and literature. Madame Lebrun, still the gayest of the gay, is upwards of eighty years of age.

Infallible cure for chapped lips.—Dissolve a lump of bees wax in a small quantity of sweet oil over a candle; let it cool and it is ready for use. Rubbing it warm on the lips two or three times will effect a complete cure.

Legal prolixity.—In the case arising out of White and Metcalf's bankruptcy, Mr. Sergeant Russell stated that the brief contained fifteen thousand folios! And in the trial at bar, Mr. H. Brougham's documents weighed three quarters of a ton!

There is one class of our citizens who are heavily taxed for the relief of the poor beyond their numerical proportion. I mean physicians. Independently of their contributions to charitable institutions, which are as liberal as those of any other class, the value of the gratuitous services they render is probably equal in amount to the contributions of all the rest of our citizens. They attend the dispensaries, the almshouse, and the hospital, gratis—and never, I believe, refuse when called on to attend the poor, who have no means of payment, and from whom they would not receive it. There are physicians in this city, whose contributions in this way amount to one or two thousand dollars per annum. This is not

THE SWABIAN BEGGAR'S SONG.

COMPOSED BY VON WEBER.

ALLEGRETTO.

I and my las - sie there, Gai - ly we trudge it; She with her light - er ware, I with my bud - get. Pledge me in a lus - ty bowl, And brim ming, brim - ming, let it be, Spark - ling, spark - ling! Like Jean - nie's e'e.

SECOND VERSE.

And when the day is done,
Good cheer surrounding,
Oh, then, how ripe for fun,
Through the dance bounding,
Pledge me, &c.

THIRD VERSE.

We live most royally,
No rule we own, sir;
For we, like kings, obey
Our will alone, sir.
Pledge me, &c.

FROM MY SCRAP-BOOK.

O how canst thou renounce the boundless store
Of charms that nature to her votary yields!
The warbling woodland, the resounding shore,
The pomp of groves, the garniture of fields,
O how canst thou renounce!—Beattie.

In our last we spoke of ignorance as being one cause of the manifested disregard to the beauties of nature. To this we may add familiarity as promoting the same result, meaning thereby, the long continued yet comparatively superficial acquaintance with the objects around us. In the pride of human intellect we survey the forms of the landscape with which we have been conversant from our infancy, and conceive that we are acquainted with all their beauties, modes of existence, and combinations of elements, and regard them as intangible of affording us any further gratification distinct from the associations connected with them. The trees we planted in our childhood have grown up with us—we saw them in the twig—we have marked their development—witnessed their changes from season to season, and, as it were, mated with them from year to year—and is it now possible to derive from them any new pleasure after so long an intimacy? We know their species and varieties, their dimensions, elasticity, and firmness of texture—how can they interest us further? But pause a moment. Have we remarked their diversity of form—their free, yet chaste proportions—their invariable adherence to the line of beauty in all their wild exuberant unfoldings—their elegance of motion when waved by the breeze, or tossed by the tempest? Have we learned all the secrets of their living laboratories, by which, in the same garden and from the same soil, the fir has secreted its healthful balsam, the upas its deadly poison, and the maple its honied sap? Have we discovered the looms which have woven for the white birch its perfumed and velvet mantle, and for the oak its rude and shaggy doublet? If not, here then are subjects for reflection and research; and here the opportunities for seeking the gratifications which accompany them when truth and nature are the objects.

The fact is, that the human mind, ever active and excursive, cannot with a good grace endure close and continued application. It is too proud and too jealous of its liberties to be severely tasked, even by its high and grasping ambition for knowledge. Novelty may for awhile hold it to one object, but the gloss is evanescent, the delicate frost-work disappears; and curiosity soon satisfied if not satiated, breaks away in pursuit of other wonders and other investigations. Thus it is led on by an insatiable thirst for novelty to the remotest objects, deeming that those which are near and of every-day perception contain nothing new or interesting. This oresumption is vain, for however long has been our acquaintance with even the simplest and least intricate configurations of matter, we may still be assured that there is some latent beauty of structure or design, of which we are ignorant. What then must be our knowledge of those more complex systems, as for instance, our own bodies, if so imperfect with regard to the most plain objects? Look at that fair hand, glancing like a form of light amidst the keys of the piano. You see nothing strange to admire; nothing but what you have beheld a thousand times before; and therefore you regard it with a listless attention. Perhaps the ear is pleased with the sweet notes of the rionella which its Ariel touch awakens; but the eye is not fascinated by the view. Yet is there more of mysterious beauty—more of the cunning of an inscrutable intelligence in that little member than is "dreamt of," perchance, in an angel's "philosophy." Suppose for a moment it should become transparent as ice—that you were permitted to trace the purple current through its innumerable canals, all pellucid as crystal, and grasp the subtleties of the vital principle in its electric movements amidst the nerves—suppose, in fine, that all the secrets of its organization were unveiled to your comprehension, how then would your presumptive knowledge of the object before you appear? With what plea could familiarity palliate your manifest ignorance? Within the superficies of a few square inches which encloses that delicate hand, what unthought-of and amazing wonders present themselves to your delighted gaze! As your eye pierces the glossy integuments which infold the various parts, you now discover that its dazzling whiteness and sylph-like grace of motion are but fractions of its sum of beauties, when its nice adjustments, its dexterous compactions, its regular and solemn pulse-strokes, its devious windings of vessels, and imperceptible attenuations of nerves, its elegant curvatures of muscles, and free mobility of every point, are not taken into account.

We apprehend that, by the thoughtlessness of familiarity, we are thus lulled into inattention and comparative indifference to nearly all other outward objects. We are too apt to sooth our ambition for knowledge with the mastery of exterior appearances, without grasping for prouder triumphs. But this was not the philosophy of Bacon. He taught curiosity not to remain satisfied with the straws and bubbles afloat on the surface of truth, but to plunge deeper and still deeper into its hidden recesses, for the rich pearls and diamonds that lie buried there. He taught that the mind's eye was not to be filled with the "show of things" alone, but with the substantial and abiding realities also. And despite its love of ease—its pride of wisdom, and its instability of purpose, how richly has the world profited by his instruction and example. How rapid have been the advances of science, how glorious and magnificent her spoils! The ancients exulted in view of their anatomical acquirements, but the researches of Hervey, Hunter and other kindred spirits have demonstrated that the superstructure of their knowledge was based on ignorance—on the frail foundation of idle hypothesis and unwarranted theories, feebly supported by a few isolated and unimportant facts. The ancients talked knowingly of astronomy, and from their high watch-towers held nightly observation of the planets, and gave names to the constellations; but it remained for Newton to explode the false teachings of the Chaldean astrologer—develop in light and beauty the mysteries of sphere-motion, and emblazon his own name for ever, as with the countless unfading stars, on the broad tablet of the whole heavens. Once men discoursed of the elements as if they had mastered every fact in relation to their qualities and modifications, but modern chemistry, like another Columbus, has discovered new worlds beyond the ultima thule of ancient research. Within a few years by the light of this science alone, man has literally found out inventions that have made

"Air, flood, and fire,
The vassals of his will."

With Montgolfier he sweeps fearlessly forth to disport himself in the high places of the air—with Franklin he disarms the lightnings of heaven—with Davy he clothes himself in power from the trodden minerals of the earth, and with Fulton he triumphantly mocks at the opposing stubbornness of winds and waves.

The cause of this new acquisition of knowledge to the world is not a mystery. It is not to be traced to any recent revelation, but to the deeper perspicacity manifested by later ages in their observance of creation. Nor will nature be offended at the growing inquisition of her works, if rightly and reverently conducted. On the other hand, the closer the scrutiny, the higher will be her satisfaction, for assured of her perfections, she knows that every new discovery of the searcher after truth not only tends to exalt and aggrandize his mind, but to improve his heart, and enlighten him more and more in the greatness, glory, and tender benevolence of their common Author.

PROTEUS.

Our greatest glory is not in never falling, but in rising every time we fall.

GEORGE F. MORRIS, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

Published every Saturday, at 163 William-street, between Beekman and Ann-streets.—Terms four dollars per annum, payable in advance.—No subscription received for a less period than one year.

J. SEYMOUR, PRINTER, JOHN-STREET.

NEW-YORK MIRROR,

AND LADIES' LITERARY GAZETTE.

VOLUME VII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 1, 1830.

NUMBER 43.

POPULAR TALES.

A SPANISH TALE.

— IN THREE CHAPTERS—CHAPTER THE SECOND.

DON FRANCISCO's soul died within him at the sound of this eternal story; and he probably wished the tale and the teller of it at least in purgatory. He sprang on his feet, and ran into the midst of the crowd. The first person he struck against was the young hussar.

"Don," said he, with a loud laugh, "I have discovered a secret. The old captain-general has been putting a trick upon all the men of honour in Valencia, for which I am determined to be revenged. I have heard him a hundred times deny that he had a living soul belonging to him. He scoffs at matrimony, as, having tried it, he well may; but to disown his daughter, or to hide her, the worse offence of the two, deserves immediate punishment."

The Don scarcely answered him, for at that moment some curious thoughts had come into his mind. Masanasa was certainly on the borders of the forest, where he had been that night—a treasure was hidden there, and he now began to trace between her features and those of the old man, the kind of resemblance that might be between whimsical deformity and extreme loveliness. But I must pass over the conversation that followed between the hussar and the Don, and the Don and the conde, because all my young readers will imagine it for themselves, and my old ones will not believe it, though I brought a carmelite to swear to every syllable. By this time the troopers had returned, carrying with them the incendiaries, who turned out to be nothing worse than the bakers of the palace-quarter, making their annual rejoicings in honour of St. Joseph, and burning his image of twice the usual size, in honour of the new captain-general. The alarm on the side of Masanasa had been of the same kind, and a procession of woodmen from the forest was soon seen coming by the long poplar avenue, with lighted fagots on the tops of poles, and drums, dulzaynas, and songs, which altogether had a very gay effect as they passed over the water to pay their respects in front of the palace. Before the ball broke up, the conde, having been forced to acknowledge that he had a daughter, had wagered the very sword that Count O'Reilly had given him on the quarter-deck of the San Stefano, against the best set of Segovia mules in the Don's stables, that he would not find out where his daughter was hid. The wager was accepted at once; wine was drank upon it, and by the time the parting-glass was finished, the Don, inspired by love and the purrat Xeres, had laid three more wagers, that he would not only see her, but get a ring from her, a lock of her hair, and even a promise of marriage. The impudent hussar was astonished at his impudence, and tried to restrain him, but it was impossible, for when love and wine are yoked in the same harness, as that most excellent poet, Pontales, says, "We may as well make them a present of the reins."

It may be supposed that the lover did not sleep much that night, and before twilight was gray he rose, and was in full consultation with the hussar. They went out soon after, passing over the Serranos bridge, and taking their way on horseback by the Murviedro suburb. How they were to get to the forest by that road is more than I know; but perhaps they took it to escape being followed. They had no attendant but that scapegrace Tomaso, and passed away through the elms like shadows. One moment they stopped to give a look at the Alameda and the river's bank. Every one knows what the famous Fray Cojuello said, "That when the curse was laid on the earth, heaven excepted the five miles round Valencia." But in my mind, the best part of those five miles is no more than a mule's stable to the river's bank above the Alameda; such groves of sycamores, with openings here and there—little gardens, stuffed with tomatos and peaches—such cottages, that for neatness look like birds' nests, covered up to the thatch with rose-bushes, and the whole crowned with that thick row of orange-trees that is in sight all the way from Fontera, and might be taken for a golden crest on a giant's helmet. This sight, by the rising sun, was as pretty a one as lord or lover could have stopped to see. At Masanasa they found that they were in the right so far as to know that there was a family in an old Dominican convent, which the captain-general frequently visited, but only after dusk; and that but one male domestic was ever seen, and he an old deaf soldier of the Walloons, who came now and then into the village for provisions. The cavaliers had scarcely heard all this, and were pondering over their chocolate how they were to learn more, when the whole village seemed pouring by the Fonda, crying out that a murder had been committed on a grandee of Spain, by a banditti, and that their captain was taken. The cavaliers were soon in the street, and were much puzzled by the different stories of the engagement. Some said that the famous Montenero de Andar, who had carried the Duke of Medina from his own hall door, a year or two before, was a prisoner; others, that the banditti had come from Arragon, beating all the king's troops by the way, and that there had been a regular battle, in which the officers of the Ronda of Valencia had earned immortal honour; with many other tales of the same kind.

At length the prisoner was brought in, sitting behind one of the horsemen of the Ronda, and the air rang with shouts for the valour of the troop. However, his face was soon known, and it turned out that the star of a grandee having been found in the wood, farther inquiry discovered that a shot had been fired by the Walloon in the night, and he was thus impeached of the murder. It was to no purpose that he denied the whole affair; he was thrown into the guard-house, the women with whom he had dealt for provisions following him, every one in tears. The Don and the hussar went to see him, and, by a duro or two, found out all his secrets. They did not amount to much, and the old man could only tell, that the Donna Rosanna was the captain-general's daughter, and that from her father's fear of the famous gallantry of the Valencian cavaliers, he had, on his coming to the command, purchased the convent, where the young lady was to remain shut up with her duenna and her women servants, until his return to Madrid, which was to be within two years. As the Don gave his honour that nothing of their conversation should be told, the old man acknowledged that he had, the night before, fired at some marauder whom he had seen on the point of getting over the garden wall.

"Now, Don," said the hussar, on the way back to his Fonda, "I suppose, as your curiosity is satisfied, we may ride back to Valencia, and if you please, we will take the open road like honest men."

"Here, Tomaso," said the Don, as if he had not heard a word that he said, "take these ten pistoles, and buy me a disguise, beggar, peasant, gipsy, or any thing."

Tomaso came back in a few minutes with both his arms full; he had, in fact, not gone out of the Fonda; for the crowd round the kitchen-stove showed as curious a collection of all kinds of rags as his heart could wish. As he laid them one by one on the floor, basquinas, capotes, sombreros, mantillas, and all, the Don and the hussar could not restrain peals of laughter; for such a collection of sheep-skin patches, bits of woollen and felt, with here and there a stripe of Lyons' silk, stolen from some smuggler's pack, was perhaps never laid side by side since the time of the Moors. Then Tomaso would take them and give a little account of each, showing them round like an experienced auctioneer, till the noise caught the ears of the crowd, and the passage was thronged with the maid-servants and travellers, roaring with merriment as they heard the comical histories of their clothing. This day was talked of for a long time after in the village. In the course of the evening the old soldier was discharged, as no one came forward against him; and Don Francisco did not let him go home without a parting present.

Next day, when the Lady Rosanna had retired to her sicsta, she was awoke by her duenna tapping at the door, to ask whether she would not see a pedler, who had brought the most beautiful ribbons and silk-nets in the world. The lady was rather angry at being disturbed, but the duenna seemed so anxious, that at length she got up and let her in.

"Well, duenna," said she smiling, and I never remember a sweeter smile than she could put on, "what am I to have from this wonderful merchant for losing my dream?"

The duenna crossed herself, and said, "that dreams were the work of the tempter; and that every dream cost her at least a peseto and two areas."

"No matter," replied the donna, "we will talk about this another time. "But," said she in a low tone, and sighing as she turned away, "all the ribbons in Valencia would not be worth my dream."

They were going out of the chamber, when the duenna suddenly went to the wardrobe, and bringing out two mantillas, threw them over her mistress's head and her own. When they entered the drawing-room, they found the table covered over with the whole contents of the pedler's baskets; and the duenna could not help openly wondering at their fineness and bright colours.

"How could you escape the officers of the Ronda?" said she, laughing; "those custom-house fellows are keen; if they had caught you their fortunes would have been made, and we should have had nothing but silks and pearls on the heads of every maraquita round the forest for a year to come at least."

"Pray, duenna, don't vex the old man," said the donna, in a voice like silver; "we have no right to lay trouble on the troubled," and she took up an artificial wreath of white Biscay roses, and waved them backwards and forwards, as if to enjoy their perfume.

"Will your ladyship please," said the pedler, "to let me match a wreath with the colour of your hair, which, I will be bold to say, is jet black?"

On this he put forward his hand to the edge of the mantilla, but the duenna pushed him back.

"So," said Donna Rosanna, laughing, "I am to have neither dream nor roses."

The pedler took out a wreath that smelt as if it had been just plucked. "This," said he, "was made by Tomaso of Figueras, for her majesty the queen of both the Spains, but its better fortune has reserved it for my Lady Duenna!"

Both the females laughed at his address, but the duenna, throwing up her veil, went to the mirror, and while her lady was turning over the silks on the table, began to try on the flowers in all imaginable ways. At length she turned round and saw to her astonishment her lady's veil off, and the hands of the pedler actually fastening the white roses in her hair. The man was rather awkward, and, before he could finish his work, the duenna had seized him like a tigress. To make amends to the pedler for so much civility thrown away, the donna made some more purchases, and he gathered up his parcel.

"Bless my soul," said the lady, feeling in her bosom with great agitation; "duenna, have you seen my purse?"

The duenna's too was gone.

"Cuerpo de San Jose," exclaimed she, "what is to become of me? The three duros that I had from my first cousin Antonio, the amulet from Father Joachim, and the medal of his catholic majesty's baptism, blessed by his holiness himself, all gone. Villain!" cried she, plunging on the pedler, "give up my money, or I will have you thrown into the inquisition: you shall be broiled, lastinadoed, and bedeviled for a son of a Jew and a thief as you are."

In her rage she tried to pull the hood off his head, which he resisted in part, and made his way to the door, bowing, and protesting his innocence all the time.

"I beg of you, fairest of duennas," said he, "not to take away my character, which is taking away my livelihood. As a proof that I did not commit this offence, I am ready to give you credit to any amount. Will your ladyship please to accept of this velvet tiara? It becomes a fair complexion, which your ladyship has."

The duenna took the tiara, with a gracious look, and ran back to show it to her mistress. But the Donna Rosanna had some thoughts passing through her mind that had nothing to do with velvet tiaras, and she asked the pedler whether he had any relations in Granada. He answered, that he had chiefly lived in Navarre, but had travelled with his merchandise from time to time along the coast, from Cadiz to Barcelona.

"It is very well," said she, and then with a deep sigh covered her face with her veil, and leaned upon the table. The duenna gave her some smelling salts, and tried to raise her head, but she continued sighing. "What is life but a dream?" escaped her lips.

"He waits to be paid," said the duenna, "and saints preserve me if I have a real."

"My Lady Duenna," said the pedler, "it is not my custom to be hard with ladies so handsome as you and your mistress: let me have any token, any ring you can spare, merely as a mark of our bargain, and I will give you a month's time." "That will do," said she; "I took you for a Jew, I confess, but you have the proper respect for a lady's word. She then took off her ring and gave it to him.

"And your lady's too," said he.

"She must not be disturbed now," said the duenna. But her lady silently took off the ring, and gave it to him, without uttering a word.

The pedler put his knees to the ground and kissed the ring, and then, with many low bows, quitted the room. The duenna still stood with one hand holding her lady's forehead, and with the salts close to her in the other.

"Did he say nothing at going away?" said the lady, after a silence of some minutes.

"No, my lady, but he took leave as gallantly as ever Don Quixote did; and though he did not like to show his face, probably because it is as brown as mahogany, I begin to doubt that he is a Jew. I wish I had my purse, however, with my three duros, my—"

"You shall have ten in place of them," said the donna, rather impatiently; "but now help me to my chamber, for I am wondrous weary."

And so she was, for before she had gone three steps she sat down on a couch at the window, and, laying her cheek on some vine leaves that grew into the open casement, seemed to fall into a heavy slumber.

It was the afternoon of the next day when the old Walloon came to inquire whether it was his lady's wish to see any of the tricks of a scholar of the renowned Abuelo, who had stopped at the gate on his way from Granada.

"If he comes from Granada, heaven be praised," said she, "for it is my own country, and I love every branch on its trees."

Soon after the sounds of a pipe and tabor were heard in the servants' hall.

"Those will be glad tidings in Valencia," said the duenna; "will not my lady consider the matter?"

"I will consider nothing," replied the donna. "I am strangely unhappy."

"Had not my lady better send for the priest to confess?"

"Can solitude confess?" returned the lady in a deep tone; and then, as if speaking to the clouds that lay like gold piled upon the sky, "what can anguish confess? can the weary life and the willing death confess? Duenna, there is a load upon my heart that is sinking me into the grave;" and with the word she sank upon her knee, her strength seemed suddenly melted, and with her forehead on her lifted hands, she prayed aloud to the virgin. Suddenly there came bursts of merriment to the door, and she had scarcely time to throw herself into the great chair, and cover her face with her veil, when the mountebank marched in with the Gitana, who carried his conjuring boxes and other implements. The duenna kept guard on one side of the chair, and the Walloon on the other, for conjurers are at best but of doubtful honesty; and all his tricks would not have been worth the repeater at her bosom, or the pearls in her hair. The conjuror was very clever, and made cups and balls, cards and glasses, dance about in a very surprising manner. As the servants were in the passage, crowding round the open door, there was nothing to be seen among them but eyes and hands turned up every moment, with now and then a sharp look for the cloven foot, but the conjuror wore huge horseman's boots, which kept them as much in the dark as ever. At length, after he had devoured several yards of fire, and poured out ribbons to suit every face in Spain, he called the Gitana, and bade her sing a ballad. She was a tall, dark complexioned girl, with a handsome countenance, a crimson cheek, and an eye that, when she began to sing, sparkled like polished jet. The conjuror tuned his rebeck, and the Gitana sang two or three pretty seguidillas, chiefly in praise of Valencia, at every one of which the servants applauded loudly, but the duenna, as became her station, only bowed.

"Duenna," said the Lady Rosanna feebly, "that girl sings well, but I am not so much charmed with her subject as you seem to be. Did you not tell me they knew something of Granada?"

The duenna replied by a sign of affirmation.

"Well, then, let me hear a Granadian song. But let the Gitana sing alone. I have heard enough of the rebeck."

The girl gave an arch look at the conjuror, and tried to restrain her laughing, as he, evidently chagrined, slowly put up the rebeck in its case. But the lady ordered him a duro, and he seemed not a little pleased with his mortification.

"What will your illustrious ladyship choose?" said the Gitana. "Will you have the loves of Maria de Fonseca and the noble cavalier Delpinos, or the fair Moresco's escape from her cruel father, or the song of the caliph as he went down the Alpuxarras, or the life and death of Juan the flower of Granada, or the death of the Abencerrage—or—"

"I protest," observed the duenna, "this girl has a marvelous memory. I don't think I could ever repeat three verses of the Año de Plata;" and she walked away a few paces, counting them on her fingers.

"Sing," said the Donna Rosanna, "something about the Mastranza, if you have any ballad of that kind."

The girl took out a small theorbo, and, throwing back the thick hair from her forehead, and fixing her eyes on the western sun as it shone through the trellis, sang, in a sweet, deep voice, the following stanzas:

Lady, if you love to hear

Tales of lofty chivalry,
Stealing beauty's sigh or tear;
List not, lady sweet, to me.

But there is a gentle sight,
Roselike, always born with May,
Full of arms and glances bright,
'Tis Granada's holiday!

Twilight on the west was sleeping,
Stars were sliding down the sky,
Morn upon the hills was peeping
With a blue, half-opening eye.

When a silver trumpet sounded,
And beside the castle wall,
Many a ribbon'd jennet bounded,
Sparkled many a lance-head tall.

In the plain, balconies proud,
Hung with silk and flowery chain,
Like a statued temple, show'd
Rank o'er rank the dames of Spain.

Soon the tapestried kettle-drums
Through the distant square were pealing;
Soon was seen the toss of plumes
By the viceroy's palace wheeling.

Then, before the portal arch,
Every horseman check'd the rein,
Till the rocket for their march,
Flaming up the sky was seen.

Like a wave of steel and gold,
Swept the lovely pageant on;
Many a champion young and bold
Bearing lance and gonfalon.

At their sight arose the roar
From the people gazing round—
Proudly came the squadrons four,
Prancing up the tilting ground.

First they gallop where the screen
With its silken tissue hides
Fair Valencia's jewell'd queen—
Helmetless every horseman rides!

Round the barrier then they wheel,
Troop by troop, and pair by pair:
Beading low the lance of steel
To the bowing ladies there.

Hark! the trumpet long and loud,
'Tis the signal for the charge!
Now with hoofs the earth is plough'd.
Now are clash'd the lance and targe.

Light as roebucks bound the steeds,
Sunny bright the armour gleams;
Gallant charge to charge succeeds,
Like the rush of mountain streams!

Noon has come—the warriors rest,
Each dismounting from his barb;
Loosening each his feathery crest,
Weighty sword, and steely garb.

Then are shown the lordly form,
Chesnut locks and eagle eyes,
Checks with tilting crimson warm,
Lips for lovers' perjuries!

As they wander round the plain,
Sparkle cross and collar gemm'd,
Sparkle knightly star and chain,
On their tunics golden-seam'd.

Till again the trumpets play,
And the mail again is worn;
And the ring is borne away—
And the Moorman's turban torn.

Closes then the tournament,
And the noble squadrons four,
Proudly to the banquet tent
March by Turia's flowery shore.

Lovely as the evening sky,
Ere the golden sun is down,
March Granada's chivalry,
Champions of the church and crown!

"I protest," said the duenna, "it is a very pretty tune, and I have heard a worse voice."

"Tell the Gitana to come near me, and the servants to close the door," said the Donna in an under tone.

The girl came near, with her eyes cast on the ground.

"Where did you learn that song, Gitana?" said the lady; "I have a great wish to know the name of the composer—or is it indeed your own?"

The girl courtisied.

"You lead a dangerous life, Gitana," said she; "with your taste for music, and your appearance, you may spend many sorrowful years for some delightful days."

The Gitana coloured, but said nothing.

"I like your modesty," continued the lady, "and, if you have no better prospect, will take you into my service. You will be useful to my spirits with your sweet voice and your theorbo, and I will not be ungrateful."

The Gitana knelt and kissed her hand, with an ardour that made the donna blush.

"These are the wild manners of your mountain life," said she, raising the Gitana; "but, duenna, you will teach her moderation."

This she said with a faint smile, and the Gitana, flinging her scarlet mantle round her shoulders, hastily withdrew to consult her father the conjuror.

"Do you know," said the donna, throwing herself back into the chair, and reclining her head over its arm, as if she were reading something on the carpet, "that girl pleases me extremely."

She then spoke no more for a minute or two, but continued humming the tune that she had just heard. The duenna stood by in silence, not knowing what turn all this might take, and perhaps not much pleased at her lady's new liking.

"I say, duenna, this same Gitana would make a useful assistant to you." The duenna was silent. "Not, of course," continued she with some emphasis, "as a duenna."

"Heaven forbid!" said the duenna, "she would make a strange protectress of your ladyship from the snares of Satan; she will, if I am not much mistaken, have enough to do to take care of herself."

"Why, yes," replied the lady, and sunk into a reverie. Then after a sigh or two, "I should have asked her whether she had ever been in love."

"The saints defend us," cried out the duenna, "of what is my lady talking?"

"I see no crime in it after all," suddenly observed the lady Rosanna, raising her head, with both her hands on the arm of the chair, and fixing her eyes on the duenna's countenance, "it may be sorrow; it has often been ruin—but it may be virtue, honour, and happiness." This she pronounced in a lofty, melancholy tone; the duenna reckoning her fingers over rapidly. "Eighteen this month," she murmured, "eighteen—not an hour more. What will the captain-general say? the next news will be, I suppose, that the rock of Aranjuez is blown away." She rang the bell.

"What's the matter now, my dear duenna," said the lady, fondly catching her gown.

"I must go to confession," was her answer.

"Then take something more to confess, and tell the priest that you think me in love."

"Can that be possible?" cried the duenna, startled, and taking out her rosary.

"I don't know but it may," sighed the lady, and again buried her face in her hands.

Before the duenna had gone through above ten beads, a low tap was heard at the door, and the Gitana came in, to say that her father could not spare her for the present, as he was engaged to be in Castile by the fair of San Ignacio, but that in a month he should be passing back by Valencia, and then—

"And then," said the donna hastily, "I may certainly expect you."

The Gitana took out a little tablet, and wrote her name, and under it the words, "Fiel a la muerte." She then put it to her lips, and, kneeling, would have given it to the lady Rosanna; but the duenna snatching it from her, and taking it to the window, held it up to the light from side to side, as if she suspected something concealed.

"I am perfectly astonished at you, duenna," said her lady, suddenly rising, and taking the tablet from her hands; "this suspicion is offensive to my feelings of propriety. I dare say by this, you have known something of clandestine correspondence, and that the cavaliers of Segovia did not find you altogether intractable."

The duenna looked as if a thunderbolt had fallen beside her, when she heard the voice of contempt and authority in which these words were expressed, and saw the beautiful figure of her mistress, with her veil up, the white wreath on her head, and her pale cheeks at once glowing with the colour of vermillion.

"Leave the room, duenna," said she; but the duenna sat down at a distance, and burst into tears. "Well, well," continued the lady, "I am tired of all this; you are forgiven." Then turning, and taking the theorbo from the Gitana, she walked towards the casement, to recover her agitation, and ran her fingers over the strings. As she drew back her head from the wind, which blew the ringlets in wild clusters over her beautiful face, she made a sign to the Gitana, who had, however, been on the point of following her, but for the duenna's actually seizing the corner of her mantle. "I have lost my practice. Take it, Gitana, and let me hear that song of the Mastranza again." The girl obediently went through the ballad; the duenna sitting with her back to them, and now and then putting both her hands to her ears. "It is well."

sung," were the only words of the lady for a while, and looking at the duenna's posture, she smiled to the Gitana, throwing up her fine eyes in pity of the old woman's idle resentment. "I think, Gitana," she at length remarked, "that your song sounded sweeter than before, and yet your voice seemed to tremble a good deal, particularly towards the close, though, perhaps, that timidity makes a song more touching." She laid her fingers lightly on the girl's arm, who, indeed, trembled more than ever, drew the edge of her mantle deeper over the forehead, and with her eyes cast on the ground, half whispered, "I had forgot, there are two stanzas besides."

"I could hear them if they were a hundred," exclaimed the donna with delight, and drawing the girl towards her chair, sat down, apparently that she might enjoy the song more deeply. The Gitana returned the theorbo, and after one or two attempts to clear her voice, thus sung,

"One still linger'd, pale and last,
By the lonely gallery's stair,
As if there his soul had past,
Vanish'd with some stately fair.

Who the knight, to few was known;
Who his love, he ne'er would tell;
But her eyes were—like thine own—
But his heart was—Oh, farewell!"

The last verse could scarcely be called singing, for the voice was little better than a murmur. But as the lady Rosanna heard it, deep sighs swelled her throat, and tear upon tear stole down her cheeks. At length she started up, and saying, "This is magic, this is madness!" walked hastily two or three times from end to end of the room. As she passed by the table the last time, she flung her purse upon it for the Gitana; but the girl stood, without stirring a step, and with her head stooping over the theorbo. "You refuse it," said the lady, suddenly stopping before her, "you dare refuse it! Yes, I knew you would, every thing thwarts me. I am the most miserable creature alive; day and night, night and day, sorrow and disappointment, no sleep, no quiet, no hope. There must soon be an end of this. I must die." She at once turned as pale as the handkerchief in her hand, and tottered against the tapestry. The Gitana threw down the instrument, and with the help of the duenna placed her in the current of air. This soon recovered her, and she said in a rather fretful tone. "So, Gitana, you refuse my present."

"I would rather," replied the girl, "have one of my lady's raven locks, than a chain of diamonds."

The duenna lifted up her hands and eyes. The lady said nothing; but drawing a single, white finger across her forehead, spread out the ringlets for her choice.

"I vow," said the duenna, as she took out her scissors and rubbed them on her sleeve to brighten them, "she is as gallant as any cavalier of them all."

The Gitana was long in choosing, and tried every one of the ringlets in turn—fixing her deep black eyes on the lady Rosanna's. Two or three times the duenna insisted on it, that she should cut off the lock and have done. But her lady commanded that she should not be hurried, and stood patiently. It was at length taken off, and the Gitana rolled it up carefully in silver paper, and put it in her bosom.

"Now, farewell, Gitana," said the donna, "and remember."

"I am bound to you for ever," said the Gitana, retiring a few steps, and gazing all over the lovely lady; then with a lofty tone and solemn gesture, as if she was raising some spell, exclaimed, "Neither the wild winter nor the summer's storm, neither the mountain ridge nor the trackless sea, neither chance nor time, shall divide me from you, lady of beauty;" and then pressing one hand on her bosom, and with the other pointing to the sun, "By the glory of that light, I will return—true as honour, faithful as friendship, and fond as love."

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE DRAMA OF HERNANI.—The new drama of Hernani is said to divide the attention of the Parisian circles with his majesty's speech; the diversity of opinions on its merits and defects is extreme, a circumstance which rather increases than diminishes its attraction; the theatre is crowded to suffocation each night it is performed.

WALTER COLYTON—This work, from the pen of Mr. Horace Smith, has been published in London. It is a tale of the court of James II. Among the characters who have a prominent place, besides the king himself and his two daughters, afterwards Queens Mary and Ann, are Lord and Lady Sunderland, the duchess of Portsmouth, Sir Charles Sedley and his daughter, the countess of Dorchester, Count Grammont, the prince of Orange, Dryden, Shadwell, Algernon Sydney, &c. &c.

GRACE SEYMOUR.—An original novel with this title has just been published in this city by Elam Bliss.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

THREE new pieces have lately been produced at this theatre, to wit, "Down East," "Rip Van Winkle," and the "Bohemian Mother." The first is a farce consisting of some ten or a dozen scenes thrown loosely together, without end or aim, except for the purpose of exhibiting Mr. Hackett in the character of a native of the eastern states. In this the author has succeeded; and Major Joe Bunker is rather an amusing addition to Mr. H.'s increasing collection of Yankee portraits. Those who have read Irving's inimitable story of Rip Van Winkle, (and who has not?) will scarcely be so much disappointed as they might reasonably expect to be in witnessing its production on the boards of a theatre. True, there is none of Irving's delicate descriptive humour, which it would be impossible to dramatize, and which, were it possible, would not be sufficiently broad and coarse for the stage; but the author, keeping the general tenor of the story in view, has introduced rougher materials of his own, which he has worked with tolerable skill. Hackett was the hero Rip, and we think played it better than some other characters in which he has been more applauded. It was not merely a series of imitations of national or local peculiarities, but in the scene where Rip returns to the village after his long sleep, and his friends refuse to recognise him, there were touches of natural feeling that are common to all mankind. The "Bohemian Mother," a melo-drama, which, to adopt the phraseology of the play-bills, "has been honoured on each successive representation with distinguished marks of approbation," appears to us, both as regards plot, incident, and language, to be the most disagreeable and miserable piece of trash that it has been our misfortune to see for many a day; and we should not have mentioned it had it not been to express our sorrow at the excellent manner in which Mrs. Sharpe played the part of Mathilde. This lady displayed much earnestness and ability throughout, and it was really a grievous sight to see talent put to such base uses. It was almost as bad as if Leslie were set to paint sign-posts, or Mrs. Austin to sing "down, down, hey derry down." If Povey had taken Barry's part, and Mrs. Durie Mrs. Sharpe's, then the thing would have been properly cast, and contempt would have been unmingled with regret. The plot is one of the agreeable incidents in the Newgate Calendar dramatized, and the scene of action transferred to Bohemia. It is a case of infanticide. Mrs. Sharpe, "a mother but no wife," is supposed to have murdered her child, an infant of about three months, and is apprehended and about to be condemned for the same, when it is satisfactorily proved that she is innocent by the production, at the critical nick of time, of the infant in propria persona, a fine large child of its age, being about the size that others generally are at three years. Mrs. Sharpe shrieked, Mr. Barry clasped his hands expressive of thankfulness, Mr. Chapman looked as if he did not exactly see the meaning of what was going forward, Mr. Richings gesticulated with considerable unction, and the curtain fell amid much applause. If the piece be played again, we suggest that the infant be arrayed in appropriate costume, that is, long drapery instead of a short frock, which, at its tender age, is a breach both of ancient custom and decorum.

A few words touching Mrs. Sharpe may not be amiss. This lady has never had justice done her by the New-York press. She is, to be sure, occasionally called a "talented woman," or a "useful and deserving actress;" but every body knows that in the bountiful and indiscriminate way in which praise is lavished on performers generally, these terms amount to nothing at all. The truth is, Mrs. Sharpe is too useful, and her talents are scattered over too wide a surface for her own reputation. The public are the gainers by it, she the loser. A certain musician in London was accumulating money by his astonishing performances on the jew's harp; his friends one day surprised him playing exquisitely on the German flute and violoncello, when he begged them as a particular favour never to mention it, because, as he shrewdly observed, "if he was known to play well on three instruments, it would not be allowed that he excelled on any." This is precisely Mrs. Sharpe's case, and a very hard case it is. She is always respectable in opera, performs many parts in tragedy better than any actress in the country, and in comedy, we think, displays more ability than in both these departments put together; and yet it is probable she would have obtained as much credit had she confined herself to any one of these three branches. Her general cleverness has unjustly robbed her of her claim to particular excellence. She lately obtained much credit by her personation of Lady Constance, and we were glad to perceive it, though Lady Constance does not appear to us by any means one of her most felicitous performances. Her taunts to Austria were given with much effect, but her grief was loud, not deep, and there were many sins both in emphasis and action which a closer study of the character may amend; however, it would gain by a comparison with any of her predecessors in the same part. We feel some curiosity to see Mrs. Sharpe as Lady Macbeth; not that we expect she would play it as it ought to be played, for no woman living can do that, but think it would be better than that of Mrs. Sloman or of any one who has attempted it on these boards for some time. In comedy Mrs. Sharpe is always pleasing.

The managers of the theatre certainly deserve great credit for the manner in which they occasionally cater for the taste of a refined portion of play-goers. A juggler of the name of Hart on Saturday evening, among other mountebank tricks, swallowed, or pretended to swallow, a large quantity of fire, and was "honoured with decided marks of approbation." This was certainly a deeply interesting and very intellectual exhibition for the boards of the first theatre in the Union, though we think the effect rather immoral, inasmuch as this familiarity with fire tends to harden the hearts of the people, and do away with their salutary fear of that element. Now if an engagement could be made with Mr. Peters, the celebrated antipodean, and any first-rate professor in the art of swallowing jack-knives and long swords, these, together with Mr. Hart, and the additional help to be derived from Blakeley's comic songs, and Collet's comic dances, would go well nigh to elevate the drama to that rank which it ought to hold in the estimation of the public. C.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

A LUMINOUS BOTTLE.—The following is the method of preparing a luminous bottle, which will give sufficient light during the night to admit of the hour being told on the dial of a watch. A phial of clear white glass, of a long form, must be chosen, and some fine olive oil heated to ebullition in another vessel; a piece of phosphorus of the size of a pea must be put into the phial, and the boiling oil carefully poured over it, till the phial is one-third filled. The phial must be then carefully corked, and when it is to be used, it must be unstopped, to admit the external air, and closed again. The empty space of the phial will then appear luminous, and will give as much light as an ordinary lamp. Each time the light disappears, on removing the stopper it will instantly re-appear. In cold weather the bottle must be warmed in the hands before the stopper is removed. A phial prepared in this way may be used every night for six months with success.

ANOTHER LAMP.—Mr. Morehouse, of Tompkins county, has invented a lamp for the burning of lard instead of oil. It differs from the common lamp only by its having a copper wire adjoining the tube which contains the wick, and connecting with the blaze of the lamp at one end, and with the lard at the other, keeping the lard in a fluid state. It is said to emit a brilliant light, give no offensive smell, accumulate no cinder upon the wick, and may be supplied at half the expense of the oil lamp.

THE INVENTION OF GLASS.—The making of glass was first discovered by the Cydonians, by certain sands on the side of a river near Ptolomais, that were crusted into that luminous body by a hard frost, and afterwards made fusible in that city. The art of making glass was brought into England by one Benault, a sovereign bishop, about the year of Christ six hundred and sixty-two.

DISCOVERY OF PURPLE DYE.—The purple dye was by accident discovered at Tyre. A dog having seized the fish conchyle or porpurab, it was observed that he had dyed his lips with that beautiful colour; an experiment was then made, and it succeeded. Purple became the royal colour, and for ages was worn by persons of the highest quality.

HARPOLYRE.—Under this name a new guitar has been invented at Paris by M. Solomon. Instead of one neck and six strings, like the common guitar, it has three necks and twenty-one strings. By this augmentation the power of the instrument is of course greatly increased.

USEFUL INVENTION.—Under this head, the New-Orleans Bee mentions that a machine has been invented by a Mr. Renoir, in that city, which is to be applied to a gig, and in cases of the horse running away can be used to stop the wheels of the vehicle, and release the animal from the harness, in an instant. The shafts of the gig do not fall, but remain in the same position as when upheld by the harness; and that the machine is said to be of so simple construction that a child may use it.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

THE RAMBLER.—NUMBER XV.

ALBUMS.

O ye! who in an album are required to write,
Be wise, before you undertake the same;
Remember that whatever you indite,
Remaineth, to your credit or your shame;
That you had better leave the paper white,
Than rack your hapless brains with idle aim;
But, above all things, if the book you take,
Don't wait a year before you bring it back.—Francis Herbert.

ALBUMS are the greatest nuisance of modern times. They waylay you, or rather are laid in your way, in every house in the city, in which a young lady, turned thirteen, happens to reside. They are as numerous and tormenting as flies at midsummer, and, like flies at midsummer, the irritating evil cannot be grappled with, and "by opposing end it;" for in both cases it is apparently so trivial, that all serious opposition and resistance become mighty ridiculous. Yet human happiness is, for the most part, made up of trifles; and it is to be feared the deduction to be made from the sum total, during the ensuing summer months, on the score of flies and albums, will far exceed that created by anxiety for the temporal welfare of our friends, or our own spiritual concerns. Petty evils and insect troubles frequently vex a person more than substantial grievances. The insignificance of an annoyance gives it a ludicrous character that is very provoking, and frets a man to think that he can be so easily fretted. Many a man's nerves are so strung that the tickling of a straw will set him almost crazy, while a heavy contusion brings him to his senses, and he smiles at the pain it occasions. Suppose, for example, a corpulent, choleric old merchant, preparing to take his after-dinner nap in an easy-chair, on a sultry day in August—suppose sleep gently descending on his eye-lids, and gradually and deliciously overclouding his faculties—suppose, at this critical moment, a rascally blue-bottle fly effects its entrance into the room, and commences amusing itself by tickling the old gentleman. He hears its ceaseless buzzing in his ears, and anon feels it promenading across his forehead, leaving an intolerable itching wherever it treads; half asleep and half awake, he impatiently jerks his head, and for a moment puts the enemy to flight; but it is only for a moment, for scarcely has he composed himself to sleep, when he again feels his friend taking a walk down his cheek and across his chin; he instinctively attempts to crush his tormentor, and slaps his own face, while all the time his nerves are acquiring a preternatural irritability; at last, a final attack upon the sensitive organ of smell puts sleep and patience to flight, and he starts from his chair in a highly sublimated degree of rage, chasing the disturber of his peace around the room in a perfect phrenzy. Suppose at this instant the door to open, and the servant to present a letter, informing him of the loss of a richly-laden vessel. He becomes on the instant calm and collected. This is a misfortune worth struggling against; he braces himself up for the encounter, and determines to "bear it like a man." Thousands meet death with perfect calmness, but we have high authority that —"there was never yet philosopher

That could endure the tooth-ache patiently;
However, they have writ the style of gods,
And made a pish at chance and sufferance."

It is the smallness of the evil, which seems to be so easily got rid of or avoided, but which cannot be got rid of or avoided, that destroys our equanimity; and it is upon this ground that albums are afflictions of the first magnitude. The person who first invented them has much to answer for. They and steam-boats are the greatest curses and blessings of the present age; the one has been productive of as much trouble and inquietude as the other has of comfort and convenience.

A certain gentleman, who takes ten glasses of brandy per diem, justifies himself by saying, that it is not the use but the abuse of stimulants that is hurtful; and every young lady who keeps an album, at the same time complains they "are so common." She seems to think that all her sex, excepting herself, are taking liberties they are not entitled to. A respectable widow in this city has eleven daughters, each of whom maintains an album; and any unfortunate visitor who is caught fairly within her doors, may think himself lucky if he escapes with the loss of five effusions. The senior portion of these misguided young ladies are fast verging towards a state of hopeless single blessedness, merely on account of the cultivation of this pernicious habit on so large a scale: they have frightened away their oldest friends, and no male creature ever ventures within their reach; and, indeed, what person in his senses would visit a house where a yard of poetry is required to be paid down as tribute? Though not exactly carried on to the same extent, there are few houses in

New-York into which a person not gifted (or cursed) with a knack of rhyming can safely venture. It is in vain that a man of an anti-poetical temperament pleads he "is no poet." "Never mind," cry the fair inexorables, "any thing will do;" though, at the same time, they expect their victim to do his very best. The fearful album is placed before him, he seizes a pen, and in a fit of desperation he "writes himself an ass" for the amusement of all future visitants. Now it is unfair, ungenerous, that a man should be violently forced into a state of authorship against his better judgment—heaven knows there are enough and to spare who voluntarily expose themselves, and feel no shame in so doing. To such ought to be left the filling up of these records of folly.

"Cold drops of sweat burst from his trembling brow,"

There is much in a name, and "Album" has now become a hateful sound; yet the idea is not in itself bad of a young and intelligent beauty preserving the scattered effusions of genius or memorials of friendship in this form. It is pleasant to see such a book carefully preserved, and shown only as an especial favour to those who may be thought worthy of looking over its treasured pages; but to have innumerable volumes of manuscript scrawls, with which genius and friendship have no connexion, continually thrust upon you—to be obliged to listen patiently, smilingly, politely, and profess yourself pleased with the recitation of two or three dozen desperate attempts at poesy—to have the beauties of the several compositions pointed out to you, and to be asked your candid opinion of each, when you dare not for your soul speak an iota of truth—and in the end to be required to add your mite to the collection, "suppose it is only two or three verses," is very disagreeable indeed, besides the disgrace of the thing; for nine-tenths of the albums are nothing better than discreditable receptacles for disreputable pieces of prose and poetry that cannot, by any stretch of the imagination, ever hope to attain the dignity of print, or be incorporated in a book form in any other shape.

The alarming increase of these plagues has probably arisen from that love of flattery which has been inherent in every man, woman, and child since the fall; particularly, it is said, in women, though on that head there may be reasonable doubts entertained. But certainly in the majority of cases where a young lady requests you to write in her album, it is only a more delicate way of asking to be flattered. If she is pretty, she likes to have it put on record; and if she is not, she well knows that poets never intentionally speak the truth. A person who is in the album-way, will have abundant opportunities of seeing the justice of this remark. I have in their pages met with the most glowing and outrageous compliments, and have invariably ascertained that they were indited by people as cold-blooded as tortoises; so true it is that the affectation of passion is ten times as violent and high-sounding as passion itself. One is at present lying before me, a few extracts from which, characterised by sense and feeling, may amuse the reader.

TO DOROTHY SOPHIA —.

Sweet maid! upon thy softly pouting lip
The fragrance of nine thousand flowers are strown;
The bee from thence nectareal dews may sip,
And otto of roses is by far outdone!

Couched in thine eyes one thousand cupid lies,
Singing their wings among those burning beams
That dart electric fires into each passer by;
Poor things! they cannot fly away it seems!

Wouldst thou wert mine! ah! at that daring thought
Tumultuous tumults burst my bursting breast—
No matter—I will soon be where I ought,
The grave will ope, and then I'll be at rest!

ALGERNON AUGUSTUS WILKINSON PRICE.

The following is of a more grave and unhappy character, and the construction of the blank verse is almost equal to that of —. It displays a fine vein of morbid feeling, and the insignificant parts of speech with which the lines terminate, have an unostentatious and natural effect.

Well, be it so! 'tis no consequence, and
I at last awake from a blissful but Most deceitful dream of happiness, which Now is flown for ever. I never will by Word or look upbraid you, though my peace is Totally destroyed, and my heart crushed to Shivers. 'Tis the lot of virtue to be
But half appreciated, and so I
Scorn to say a single word about my Most untoward fate. I soon will be a Piece of dull and inanimate clay and
All will be well! I've done, but still my Last and latest prayer shall be for—no
Matter—fare thee well!

ABRAHAM O. HIGGS.

It will be seen how strictly the amiable author of the foregoing has adhered to the only sure and certain rule of making blank verse, that is, being particular in having ten syllables per line. Nothing is easier, and by attending to this simple rule an auctioneer's advertisement may be taken out of the newspapers and made into unimpeachable blank verse without any sort of trouble. The manner in which Shakespeare and Milton have occasionally departed from this fundamental principle is unpardonable. I had proposed to have given twelve or fifteen pages more of extracts, but defer doing so in consequence of the heat of the weather.

If all, or a portion of the above remarks, should be offensive to the feelings of any lady who keeps an album, I hope she will do me the justice to believe that I certainly meant here to be an exception to these general observations. C.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

PORTRAITS OF CELEBRATED CHARACTERS.

FRANCIS JEFFEREY,

Late editor of the Edinburgh Review.

THE extensive and powerful influence which the Edinburgh Review so long held in the republic of letters, induces us to offer the following brief notice of Mr. Jefferey, who, until lately, has been the principal editor of that popular depository of able and learned criticism.

Francis Jefferey is the eldest son of the late George Jefferey, one of the deputy clerks of sessions in Scotland. He was born in Edinburgh in 1773. He received the rudiments of his education at the high school there, entered the university of Glasgow in 1787, was admitted to Queens College, Oxford, in 1791, and in 1795 came to the Scottish bar, where he still continues in possession of an extensive practice. Mr. Jefferey, at a very early period, gave promise of those fine talents which have since made him a leader in the literary world; and it is understood that his father, who observed his powers, devoted himself zealously to his education, with a firm conviction of the future eminence that awaited his son, but of which he did not live to witness the full accomplishment.

From this early and assiduous cultivation of his faculties, Mr. Jefferey acquired that complete power over his imagination and judgment, which subsequently qualified him for the celebrity he attained as the first literary censor of his age.

While in Edinburgh he engaged actively in the debating societies, which are favourite institutions there, and are undoubtedly great contributors to the purposes of education, by eliciting talent and fostering genius, which might otherwise languish in obscurity if unaided by these powerful auxiliaries for its development. We need but quote the names of Burke, Garrow, Erskine, Fox, Sheridan, and other eminent characters who received the elements of their forensic eloquence through these initiatory means.

The speculative society to which Mr. Jefferey was attached at this time, contained among its active members many persons who have since attracted general notice; among whom may be mentioned Mr. Brougham, who subsequently became an able coadjutor to Mr. Jefferey in the first establishment of the Edinburgh Review.

Notwithstanding the greatness of Mr. Jefferey's talents, his progress at the bar was long extremely doubtful; amidst all his reputation it was but slowly and progressively that he rose into the high practice he at present enjoys. In the criminal court he is now considered unrivalled as an advocate. It may easily be imagined that the quickness of his mind, the clearness of his conceptions, the strength and beauty of his language, joined to a thorough familiarity with the law, must render him almost irresistible before a jury.

In the year 1802 Mr. Jefferey became associated with several eminent literary characters in the establishment of the Edinburgh Review, of which he was one of the original projectors, and after one year, when it was under the conduct of the reverend Sidney Smith, has been its sole editor, until his secession from the editorial chair last year.

At the period when this work was commenced, the want of such a journal had long been felt in the reading world; few, if any, of the numerous periodicals devoted to criticism were above mediocrity, and all, more or less, prostituted their pages to venal praises of certain favoured authors and the cupidity of particular publishers.

The high and impartial tone which the Edinburgh Review assumed from its commencement, immediately commanded attention, and it will be only echoing the opinion of the great mass of its readers to assert, that no publication ever obtained so complete an influence over public sentiment as the celebrated review under consideration, and for which it has been principally indebted to the pen of Mr. Jefferey.

It would be a curious speculation to inquire what was the exact share taken in this work by the highly-talented individual of whom we are writing. An authentic list has been seen of the articles from the pen of Mr. Jefferey, which are represented as exciting great surprise from the voracious talents exhibited by their distinguished author, who has proved himself conversant with the most opposite studies. Much also is said of the endless operations of this great critic on the works of his coadjutors, whereby he sustained an almost equal cast of excellence in every article which appeared in the Review.

In politics Mr. Jefferey is decidedly a supporter of the opposition, or to use the general soubriquet in England, he is a "whig." The march of liberal principles in the British cabinet has, however, subdued much of this hostile feeling towards the government, and the enlightened and constitutional measures he has long advocated, appear now to be popular with the present ministry.

In theology he has been attacked by his enemies as verging on to scepticism, while his admirers consider that he has ever powerfully supported the great truths of christianity, unbiased by sectarian dogmas, and untrammelled by established forms. Several articles in the Review, understood to be written by him, are indicative of a sound and pious mind.

In elegant literature he has been exposed to much reprehension, having laid down canons of criticism which confine works of the imagination and the heart to certain regulations which, if adhered to, would petrify the warmth and paralyze the energies of poets and poetry. That he has not been infallible in some of these rules, we need only refer to his criticisms on the early poems of Byron, which he declared were utterly destitute of any indications of genius. It is but justice to add, that he evinced a manly candour on the publication of the first canto of Childe Harold, alike honourable to himself and the noble author, and which, by the interesting correspondence lately published in Moore's Life of Byron, received its just praise from his lordship.

Of the private character of Mr. Jefferey it is gratifying to be able to say, that in domestic life he is greatly beloved and respected. He is described as being a kind, good-hearted man, cheerful and amiable in his temper, and entirely free in his opinions from any portion of that violence which might be expected from the keen satirist who wields the thunders of the Edinburgh Review. He has been married twice; his present wife is the daughter of Charles Wilkes, Esq. of this city, and grand-niece of the celebrated John Wilkes, so well known during the early part of the reign of George the third.

Mr. Jefferey closed his editorial labours with the ninety-eighth number of the Edinburgh Review, and has been succeeded in that capacity by Mr. Napier, a gentleman who has been long distinguished in the literary world as a successful and elegant writer. H*.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE SCHOOLMASTER.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

JEREMIAH PAUL was a short, round personage, with a quick, I had almost said a spiteful, little grey eye—a bald head in front, and a short, stiff cue behind. He was a wonderful man to look at, and his history was no less so than his person. At one period of it he was the village schoolmaster—a rare pedagogue and learned being—it is said not only familiar with Dilworth's Spelling-Book and the Psalter, but also with such difficult mathematical problems as are comprehended in the elementary principles of Pike's Arithmetic. It may be readily supposed that such a ripe and rare scholar would not be suffered to remain long in obscurity. His talents were not of an order "to blush unseen," and accordingly, in his fortieth year, he was honoured with the office, and enriched with the emoluments appertaining to no less a dignitary than a justice of the peace.

But we are getting ahead of our story, and, with the reader's permission, we will go back a few years, and introduce him to the wife of Master Paul. She, too, was an uncommon character—a great, good-natured, handsome romp, who used to attend school on purpose, to use her own phrase, "to plague Master Jerry." And verily she was a plague! She used to bounce in and out whenever she pleased—she pinched the boys, inked the faces of the girls, and finally to such a pitch did her audacity arrive, that she even presumed to lay hands on the nicely powdered cue of the dominie himself!

Jeremiah was leaning over his desk in a musing attitude, engaged in a profound mathematical calculation respecting the probable value of the tenant of his landlord's pig-stye, when this outrage took place. He had already placed the subject in half a dozen different attitudes before his mind's eye, and was just on the point of committing his lucubrations to the fragment of a slate upon which his elbow was resting, when a vigorous jerk at the hairy appendage of his pericranium started him bolt upright in an instant, and drew from him a cry not unlike that of the very animal which was the subject of his scientific cogitations.

Jeremiah did not swear—he was an exemplary and church-going pedagogue—but his countenance actually blackened with rage and anguish as he gazed hurriedly and sternly around him; and the ill suppressed laughter of his disciples, added not a little to his chagrin. "Who?—who?—who? who?—I say!" He could articulate no more. He was choked with passion.

"That are great ugly girl there, who pinches me so," said a little ragged urchin, with a streaked face.

Jeremiah confronted the fair delinquent; but it was plain from his manner, that he had much rather have undertaken the correction of his whole school beside, than that of the incorrigible offender in question. His interrogating glance was met by a look, in which it would have been difficult to say whether good nature or impudence predominated.

"Did you meddle with my cue?" said the dominie; but his voice trembled; his situation was peculiarly awkward.

"I—I—what do you suppose I want of your cue?" and a queer smile played along her pretty mouth—for a pretty one she had; and what is more, the dominie himself thought so.

Jeremiah saw that he was about to lose his authority—he hemmed twice—shook his head at such of the rogues as were laughing immoderately at their master's perplexity, and reaching his hand to his ferule, said,

"Give me your hand, miss?" His heart misgave him as he spoke.

The fair white hand was instantly proffered, and as gently too as that of a modern belle at a cotillion party. Jeremiah took it—it was a pretty hand, a very pretty hand—and then her face—there was something in its expression which seldom failed to disarm the pedagogue's anger. He looked first at her hand, then at her face, so expressive of a roguish confidence; and then at his ferule—a rude heavy instrument of torture, altogether unfit to hold companionship with the soft fair hand held in durance before him.

Never, in all the annals of his birchen authority, had Jeremiah Paul experienced such perplexity. He lifted his right hand two or three several times, and as often withdrew it.

"You will not strike me," said the girl.

There was an artless confidence in these words, and the tone in which they were uttered, that went to the very heart of the pedagogue. Like Mark Antony before the beautiful Cleopatra, or the fierce leader of the Volsci before his own Virginia—the dominie relented.

"If I pardon you for this offence, will you conduct yourself more prudently in future?"

"I hope I shall," said the hopeful young lady, and the master evinced his affectionate solicitude for the welfare of his pupil by pressing the hand he had imprisoned; and the fair owner expressed her gratitude for such condescension by returning the pressure.

They were married just six months afterwards. So much for lenity in school discipline. Essex Register.

MISTRESS ELIZABETH HILL.

[Translated from the German.]

In a small but pretty town of Suabia resided a rich and handsome young widow, Mrs. Elizabeth Hill. All her acquaintances were at a loss what to make of her, for she was not for any length of time the same, but continually changing. At first a certain counsellor gave the tone to the fashionable society of the place, and as he was fond of gallant literature, Mrs. Hill read novels from morning till night. He died, and a doctor of medicine assumed the sway of fashion; he was fond of gaieties and gave splendid dinner parties and balls. Mrs. Hill laid aside her books and became passionately fond of dress and dancing. Not long after this, the prince, from some motive or other, removed the bishop's see to this place. This bishop, who had a large income, was also a pious and very eloquent man. From that time Mrs. Hill laid aside all gay ornaments, and was only seen in slate colour or black, and at her house she had weekly religious meetings. The opinions of the public as to what could be the cause of such continual changes were much divided. A professor of the college, a belles lettres scholar, and one of the principal contributors to a fashionable magazine, asserted that Mrs. Hill had no character whatever; and, though beautiful, she was neither a subject for the poet, for a novel, or for the stage. The bishop, on the contrary, whose thoughts were little engaged either with novels or with the stage, was quite of a different opinion.

"Mrs. Hill," said he, "at first indulged her sinful propensity in secret by reading novels, until, by gradual advances, she exposed herself at public balls and dances. Her eyes have been opened, she has repented and received grace, and a complete reformation has taken place." The doctor again differed entirely from the bishop. "Her mind," said he, "has nothing to do with this change. The sedentary life which she has led while reading much, and afterwards continual dissipation at night parties have thickened her blood. A few bleedings and the free use of Selters waters will restore her to former health and vigour." All three were prejudiced in favour of their own opinion, though all three were wrong, and as the great mass of people seldom think or reflect much for themselves, they generally adopted the opinion of one of the three, as it happened to coincide with their own interest. The bookseller, who of late had furnished Mrs. Hill's library with many valuable theological works, coincided in opinion with the bishop, and sincerely congratulated her on her reformation. The silk and lace mercers, who had lost one of their best customers, sided with the doctor; others who had not altogether lost her, expressed their regret that so good a woman as Mrs. Hill should be so fickle, and not know herself what she wanted. The prince, who always rewarded merit, removed the bishop to the metropolis, in order to have him also as his own chaplain, and, to indemnify in some degree the town for the loss of the bishop's see, quartered there a battalion of his guards, commanded by a major of rank and fortune, and of a very comely person. In less than a month the major was a regular guest at Mrs. Hill's dinner parties, and Mrs. Hill at those of the major. The major's wife was a lady of handsome figure, and a great beauty. When dressed in a riding-habit and mounted on a spirited Arabian, she galloped through the town, and every eye was fixed upon her with admiration. Mrs. Hill, conscious of being in no way inferior to the major's lady, either in figure or personal graces, soon procured a nag as beautiful as could be found in the country, and, dressed in a riding-habit with gold epaulettes on her shoulders, was daily seen to accompany the major's wife in her rides. "The woman is devoid of all character!" said the professor. "The woman has lost the grace!" said the dean, as she passed his door. "She has followed my prescriptions!" said the doctor. A plain man, but possessed of much good sense, shook his head when he heard such various opinions, and thought Mrs. Hill knew perfectly well what she wanted. "Who used to be the first man in our society?" asked he. "The counsellor." "And when he died?" "The bishop." "And when he was removed to the metropolis?" "The major." "Now, good people, what appears to you as inconsistency, is nothing but vanity." New-York American.

THE PICTURE.

BY GEORGE D. PRENTICE, ESQ.

In 1801 I passed several months in Rome. I was then fourteen years of age—a period of life when all that goes to make up the romance of existence is beautiful and shadowless. Every object in that glorious clime went to my heart with a sense of living joy. I often gazed, even with a wild excess of passionate delight, upon the diadems of mist that rested on the brow of the Tiber, the sky that floated overhead like a web of blue gossamer buoyed by its own lightness, and the stars that hung beneath it like birds of paradise resting in the middle air. And the hills too—they were crowned with ever-green wreaths, like the brows of the ancient poets of that eternal city, and the winds came breathing as softly and sweetly around me as if they had been the incense offered up by spirits to the memories of the mighty dead that were slumbering there.

After getting familiar with the different parts of the city, I strayed alone, one summer morning, to a distinguished gallery of paintings. I found there many beautiful and god-like faces, and gazed upon them long and earnestly. There was one—but no—I cannot describe the spiritual beauty and the calm and holy rapture of repose that glowed in its every lineament. It was the face of a young female, and so wildly beautiful, and, withal, so unlike every thing which I had before seen or fancied of loveliness, that it chained my spirit like a spell from heaven. I lingered around it more than an hour, and gazed until my heart seemed to melt, and take the image of those blessed features. The seal was set for ever. I deemed that the pictured face before me was the delineation of some creature of the earth, and, for that unknown and imaginary being, I felt all the idolatry of passion. From day to day, and from week to week, I returned to dwell upon that countenance, and, more than once, as I awoke from a delirium of fascination, I found myself standing before the picture with my lips half open and my arms convulsively extended, as if striving to woo the pictured face into life, and clasp it with the fervour of undying love. Months passed away and I left the city. The picture was the last object to which I bade adieu, and, on turning from it for ever, I wept with all the agony of a heart-broken child.

Years have done their silent work upon my heart, but they leave unchanged and undimmed the image that was shrined there in my boyhood. I have sought in vain for its resemblance among lovely and gifted creatures. In the presence of mourners and the company of the mirthful, my eyes have wandered anxiously over beautiful faces, till at length I was forced to close them—close them in bitterness to hide the tears, that, in spite of pride and manhood, were gushing wildly upward from their fountain. Often in dreams upon my midnight pillow, I have, for a moment, realized the dear object of my early love, but, while gazing upon it, it would melt away into the air and leave me to mourn over the bitter mockery. Fancy too has pictured it before me in my waking hours. I have seen it softly floating upon the blessed moonbeams as they lingered around the distant streams—it has come and stood before me in its unearthly beauty when I have been sitting silent and alone beneath the quiet gloom of twilight—and, many times, as I have been leaning upon the tall cliffs of the ocean, fancy has pictured it as a holy naiad of the sleeping waters. I am getting old, I cannot find the being of my first, my last, my only love, among the daughters of men, and I feel that the last blossom of my heart is stricken by disappointment.

Shall I see that remembered face in the spirit-land? It must be so. The imaginings that wander over the earth unsatisfied, and return to fold their faint and weary wings in the vacant heart, will find in that land the holy realities for which they have so long pined in loneliness and sorrow. That form, it is a flower, that opens in the dews of some purer sphere—a portion of some bright but invisible Eden—and I long to go away and gaze for ever upon its immortal youth and purity.

CLOTHING OF CHILDREN.

When we observe the extreme anxiety of mothers to improve the beauty, and impart grace to the forms of their daughters, we cannot but pity the ignorance and infatuation which induce them, in too many instances, to resort to means calculated much more effectually to defeat the object so ardently desired, than to promote it. A very slight knowledge of the human frame, and of the manner in which it is influenced by external agents, would teach them the absurdity of all attempts to supply, by artificial means, what can result only from the unassisted efforts of nature. In infancy as well as in adult life, the first and most important object of consideration should be to preserve and promote the health and vigour of the body—since with its health we necessarily maintain its symmetry and improve its beauty.

Bodily deformity, in particular, unless congenital, or the effect of unavoidable disease or accident, is in the great majority of cases produced by nursery mismanagement, and the employment of the very means which are resorted to in order to prevent it.

The fact cannot be too often repeated, nor can it be too seriously urged upon parents, that the foundation of a graceful and just proportion in the various parts of the body must be laid in infancy. A light dress, which gives freedom to the functions of life and action, is the only one adapted to permit perfect unobstructed growth—the young fibres, unconstrained by obstacles imposed by art, will shoot forth harmoniously into the form which nature intended. The garments of children should be in every respect perfectly easy, so as not to impede the freedom of their movements. With such liberty, the muscles of the trunk and limbs will gradually assume the fine swell and development which nothing short of unconstrained exercise can ever produce. The body will turn easily and gracefully upon its firmly poised base—the chest will rise in noble and healthy expanse, and the whole figure will assume that perfectness of form, with which beauty, usefulness, and health are so intimately connected.

Journal of Health.

A STRANGE STORY.

Lord Byron sailed to Lisbon in the year 1809 with a Captain Kidd, of whom he used to mention a very strange story. "This officer stated, that, being asleep one night in his berth, he was awakened by the pressure of something heavy on his limbs, and, there being a faint light in the room, could see, as he thought, distinctly the figure of his brother, who was at that time in the naval service of the East Indies, dressed in his uniform and stretched across the bed. Concluding it to be an illusion of the senses, he shut his eyes and made an effort to sleep. But still the same pressure continued, and, still, as often as he ventured to take another look, he saw the figure lying across him in the same position. To add to the wonder, on putting his hand forth to touch this form, he found the uniform, in which he appeared to be dressed, dripping wet. On the entrance of one of his brother officers, to whom he called out in alarm, the apparition vanished; but, in a few months after, he received the startling intelligence that on that night his brother had been drowned in the Indian seas. Of the supernatural character of this appearance Captain Kidd himself did not appear to have the slightest doubt.

Moore.

CAUSE OF INSANITY.

A late writer has astonished the philosophical reader upon the subject of insanity, by asserting that madness or insanity is inflicted on human beings by Almighty God as a punishment for their sins. For my part, I consider insanity in the nature of a diseased function of the brain, and have observed what I have considered very wicked and abominable characters who have shown no signs of madness, unless, indeed, their being wicked should be admitted as an a priori evidence of their being so; and, on the contrary, other persons, who have observed all the duties of life, have become the unfortunate victims of this malady. We always lose our discretion when we arrogate to ourselves the office of a cabinet counsellor to the Supreme Being, and attempt to account, religiously or morally, for his inscrutable dispensations.

Manual for Invalids.

EPISTLE TO A YOUNG FRIEND JUST MARRIED.

The following very pretty lines are copied from the Courier and Enquirer. They bear the initials of James Lawson, Esq. one of the editors of that journal:

On matrimony's fickle sea,
I hear thou'st ventured fairly,
Though young in years it may not be
Thy luck is lanced too early.
Each wish of mine to heaven is sent
That on the stormy water,
Thou'lt prove a wife obedient
As thou hast been a daughter.

If every wish of mine were bliss,
If every hope were pleasure,
Then wouldst thou find him full of bliss,
And live in love a treasure.
For every wish and hope of mine,
And every thought and feeling,
Is for the well of thee and thine,
As true as my revealing.

I know thy youthful heart full well,
Thou'rt thoughtless of the devil;
But guard, as if my verse should tell
My mind in words unswell:
For the advice which I nodde,
Thy thank me not too early.
'Tis from the heart each word I write,
O mayst thou mark me duly.

To please thy husband in all things,
For ever be thou zealous;
Aye bear in mind that love has wings,
Then never make him jealous.
For if love from him has fled,
How weak are beauty's jesses!
In vain wouldst plead thy streaming eyes,
And thy dishevelled tresses.

Be pious in thy thoughts of dream,
Be quiet of thy passions;
Where reason is to be obeyed,
O nothing there but art is.

And can its palling sweets compare,
With love of faithful beauty?
Then of the fatal tree beware,
There's poison in its blossom.

Each thought and wish in him confide,
No secrets from him cherish;
As when as thou hast sought to hide,
The better feelings perish.
In what's thy joy to say,
O never with him falter;
Remember too, that whilst "obey,"
Dearer the holy altar.

Better and faster, for you may find
Uncounted times to love ye,
And should thy husband seem unkind,
Averse to smile or please ye;
Think, that amidst the scenes of life,
He touch has found to join him;
Then smile as it becomes the wife—
With naive strive to cheer him.

Aye answer him with kindly word,
Be each time sweetly spoken,
For often is the marriage cord
By angry words broken.
Then curb thy temper in its rage,
And fustian be thou never,
For severed once, a fearful change
Hanes over both forever.

Upon thy neck light hang the chain,
For hymen now has bound thee;
O'er thee and thine may pleasure reign,
And smiling friends surround thee.
Then fare thee well, and may each time
The sun smile find thee wiser;
Pray kindly ever the well-meant rhyme,
Of thy sincere adviser.

J. L.

PORTRAIT OF A VOLUPTUARY IN FRANCE.

If contempt were not an unchristian feeling that should be checked on every occasion as soon as it arises within the mind, I know one character, at least, by which it might be excited in a very forcible degree. It is that of the voluptuous man, who, in the vigour of his health and manhood, caters for his comfort like a convalescent—a helpless creature, who is afraid to burden, with the weight of frame, a set of muscles capable of upholding a weight that would strain the back of a young horse. He shrinks like a blasted nabob from the slightest breath that agitates the perfumed atmosphere of his apartment, and stuns your ears with accounts of draughts from the windows and from the doors, together with expedients for their modification, until you fancy you are speaking with a poor terrified Italian of the malaria. He makes a greater preparation for shaving his beard in the morning than a sensible man would use before the amputation of a limb, and considers the keenest edge no finer than a handsaw. He inquires of his man, ere he descends, which way the wind blows, and takes his seat on the lee side of the screen, lest he should be blown away by one of those awful parlour hurricanes while he is eating his potted shrimps and chocolate. To excess, indeed, of all kinds he is a stranger; but the love of virtue is not the safeguard which protects him. He is thoroughly sensual; but the labour of an intense enjoyment is the rubicon which he will not pass. He creeps, and shrinks, and shivers himself into a premature old age; and is at length moulded out of the world by dyspepsy and hypochondria.

Tales of the Five Senses.

LOCKING THE DOOR DURING DINNER.

The custom of keeping the door of a house locked during the time of dinner, probably arose from the family being anciently assembled in the hall at that meal, and liable to surprise. But it is in many instances continued as a point of high etiquette of which the following is an example. A considerable landed proprietor, in Dumfriesshire, being a bachelor, without any near relations, and determined to make his will, resolved, previously, to visit his two nearest kinsmen, and decide which should be his heir, according to the degree of kindness with which he should be received. Like a good clansman he first visited his own chief, a baronet in rank, descendant and representative of one of the oldest families in Scotland. Unhappily the dinner-bell had rung, and the door of the castle had been locked before his arrival. The visitor in vain announced his name and requested admittance; but his chief adhered to the ancient etiquette, and would on no account suffer the doors to be unbarred. Irritated at this cold reception, the old laird rode on to Sanquhar castle, then the residence of the duke of Queensberry, who no sooner heard his name, than, knowing well he had a will to make, the drawbridge dropped and the gates flew open—the table was covered anew—his grace's bachelor and intestate kinsman was received with the utmost attention and respect, and it is scarcely necessary to add, that, upon his death some years after, the visitor's landed property went to augment the domains of the ducal house of Queensberry. This happened about the end of the seventeenth century.

Note to Old Mortality.

JEU D'ESPRIT.

The following jeu d'esprit appears in the "Age." Having occasion during the past week to explore the file of one of the morning papers for an advertisement, several singular notices to correspondents caught my eye. Their true meaning you can perhaps explain. Yours,

Tom Brown.

"Common sense," if possible, in our next.

"Christianity" must be deferred for more temporary matter.

"Scandal" has already appeared in a former paper.

"Truth" is inadmissible.

"Honesty" would be unintelligible to many of our readers.

We know nothing of "Good Manners," therefore the writer must be mistaken in his conjectures.

"A Friend to the Administration" must be paid for.

"Scurrility" may depend upon being inserted in the course of the week.

"Decency" must be altered to make it fit for our columns.

"A Patriot" is at present rather out of date.

"A Statesman" is too full of errors for publication.

"Reformation" must be better authenticated before we can venture to insert it as truth.

"An Honest Lawyer," with other originals, in a day or two.

"Matter of Fact" does not come within the circle of newspaper intelligence.

British Traveller.

GENEROSITY TO A RIVAL.

The following is an extract of a letter from Paris to a young lady in London. "Banns of marriage, between a French gentleman of the name of M., and Miss H., the daughter of the Rev. Sir John H., had been published at the church of St. Philippe du Roule, under very strange circumstances. A British officer now here was paying his addresses to the young lady in question, and with her father's approbation. He discovered, however, that she loved a Frenchman, Monsieur M., whose disqualification in the estimation of the Rev. Baronet was want of fortune; ascertaining also that the possession of one hundred thousand francs would remove all objections to the favoured lover, Captain D., with a rare generosity, advanced the money, and thus proved, in a way that cannot be questioned, that the happiness of the object of his affections was more to him than his own.

English paper.

MODERATION.

In former days there was a professor in one of our New England colleges, who was remarkable for moderation in all that he said or did. One of the quizzical students, in order to caricature this characteristic, so far as words can caricature, told the following story. The professor walked out one day very deliberately from his house to the president's, a distance of some thirty rods. He there knocked, as was customary, at the president's study door, was bidden to come in, went in, shutting the door after him. The usual salutations passed alternately between the president and professor, such as, "How do you do, sir? how does your family, sir?" with the usual reply, "Pretty well, I thank you; much as usual, I thank you," &c. "Then," says the president, "please to take a chair, Mr. Professor." "I thank you, sir, I cannot conveniently stay to be seated. I called to inform you that your house is in a blaze, and it is expected you will let us have the key which leads to the water engine for extinguishing the fire."

BR OOKLYN COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE

For Young Ladies &c.

OPPOSITE N. YORK.

THE SMILES AND TEARS OF APRIL.

The division of the seasons was distinctly marked out by nature before they were notched down by man. The months have all their several and defined characteristics; and April only is known as the period, the characteristics of which not being precisely known, cannot be precisely delineated. It is literally the season of caprice—emblematical of young women's affections, and young gentlemen's vows—dowagers' tears—and—our fortunes. We remember to have heard this peculiarity in April accounted for in a way by no means unpoetical. We got the matter from some old book, or some young lady—both very charming companions at all times, though neither exactly in our recollection now. Nature once (said they—the book or the lady) being somewhat divided in the measure of her regards for her several children, the seasons, and grandchildren, the months, and not being disposed to exhibit anything like an undue partiality for any one of them in particular, determined upon assigning to them certain periods of time when each of them might visit her singly, and without dread of encroachment or intrusion from any of the others. A certain day was accordingly set aside when they were all required to appear before her, in order to be informed as to the future division of their time. A general notice having been given, the great mother took her seat upon a high mountain, and her children began to gather around her. All were there, the seasons and the months, April only excepted, from among the latter. They waited for some time for the appearance of the stray grand-child until they grew impatient, and nature proceeded to the division of her time among the rest. We all know what their several assignments were. April only, being absent at the distribution, got none. She had just concluded her labours when the wanderer made her appearance. She was a beautiful child, with light hair and blue eyes, of a capricious step, and carried about her an air of that indescribable grace and sweetness which we so much admire in female youth, just at its entrance into womanhood. In her hand she carried a wreath of the choicest and most beautiful flowers. "Where hast thou been, idle one," said her mother, hastily, "when I was distributing my favours among the rest of my children? Thou now hast nothing. I have no time to allot thee—I can see thee no more."

The tear glistened upon the cheek of the child, and her heart was full. "Oh, mother," she cried, "revoke thy decree. I have been no laggard, but I would not come to thee empty handed. See these flowers—I have sought them over land and over sea—in wild and in valley, and I have framed them into a beautiful wreath to encircle thy brows. Forgive me then, dearest mother, and revoke thy cruel sentence."

Nature grew touched at this unlooked for tenderness and affection, on the part of the beautiful child, and taking her in her arms, she exclaimed—"I cannot revoke my decree, thou truant, but I will place thee under the care of spring, who shall always bring thee along with her; the flowers which thou hast gathered for me, I bind upon thy own forehead, and thou shalt always wear them." Thus April rejoiced with many smiles, whilst the tears yet trembled on her eye-lashes. And for this cause, divided between sorrow and joy, comes she at her own season to pay her devotions to nature, with a wreath of choice and various flowers upon her head, and a strange union of tears and smiles upon her capricious countenance.

New Monthly Magazine.

SMART REPLY.

A young gentleman who had quarrelled with a lady to whom he had paid his addresses, was so impudent as to threaten that he would publish the letters she had written him. "That," she replied, "would be truly vexatious, for though I need not be ashamed of the contents, I certainly ought to be ashamed of their direction!"

English paper.

BOOKS AND READERS.

The majority of readers ramble through books as post-boys ride through towns—merely for despatch; and when they arrive at the end, can tell you as little of the contents as those who carry the mails can of the letters enclosed in them. The former, perhaps, will relate how many pages they have read, and the latter how many miles they have ridden; but if you want any further information, you must seek it elsewhere, or go without it altogether.

Ibid.

PATTERN FOR A COAT.

A few days ago a gentleman, in looking over his tailor's account, observed a charge of six or seven shillings more on a coat than he had been accustomed to pay. On inquiring, the tailor informed him "that he had been obliged to take up an additional quantity of cloth." "Why," exclaimed the gentleman, "it was scarcely half a year ago that you told me you managed to get a waistcoat for your little boy from what remained of the cloth you made my coat from. I cannot conceive why I should require more now, as I am convinced I have not increased any in size since that period." "No, sir," said the tailor, "you are much the same as usual; but my little boy is so surprisingly grown you'd scarcely know him!"

Boston Galaxy.

PROFESSIONAL ENTHUSIASM.

The "Ancient of Days" was such a favourite with Blake, that three days before his death he sat bolstered up in bed, and tinted it with his choicest colours and in his happiest style. He touched and re-touched it—held it at arm's length, and then threw it from him, exclaiming, "There, that will do! I cannot mend it." He saw his wife in tears—she felt this was to be the last of his work. "Stay, Kate!" cried Blake, "keep just as you are—I will draw your portrait, for you have been an angel to me." She obeyed, and the dying artist made a fine likeness.

Sketches of Artists.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Maternal influence and responsibility.—Is it not a startling reflection, that not only the temporal character and condition of a community, but even the eternal destiny of its members, must depend, in no inconsiderable degree, on contingencies that are too often estimated as quite trifling considerations? It is, however, hazarding but little to assert, that such is the solemn fact. Would it were written in the stars, engraved on pyramids of adamant, and, above all, deeply impressed on every human heart, that on the moral and intellectual character of married females depends the happiness or misery of every succeeding generation. And yet how very few, comparatively speaking, ever think of female education, except as the acquirement of a few elegant accomplishments, of no real, intrinsic, or permanent value. How few parents reflect that their daughters, in their turn, are to become mothers, and that maternal influence is the principal, we had almost said the sole agent, in moulding the future character of their children.

If we consult the pages of history, both sacred and profane, we shall find that there have been very few great and good men who were not blest with virtuous, intelligent, and judicious mothers. Whenever Providence has raised up a special agent for the performance of any great physical or moral achievement, the way has always been first prepared for him on the principle of maternal influence. Cyrus, who was called by name, and his glorious achievements predicted long previous to his birth, was early taught to revere the gods by his mother, Munda. Samuel, the judge and defender of Israel, was devoted to his prophetic office before he was born, by his pious mother Hannah. The piety, tenderness, and ingenuity of a Levite mother preserved the future leader of Israel, to effect their deliverance from Egyptian bondage. That the wife of Manoa was qualified to form the character of an infant hero, is easily inferred from the fact of her being honoured by a special messenger from heaven, to announce the birth of Sampson. The young apostle Timothy was prepared for that holy office by the pious instruction of his mother Eunice, and his grandmother Lois. Constantine was rescued from paganism by his mother Constantia; and Edward the sixth of England inherited those excellent qualities which made him the delight of the age in which he lived, from his mother, Lady Jane Seymour.

It is not necessary, however, to confine ourselves to the ancients for instances in support of our position. Both Newton of England and the immortal Washington of America owe much, if not all their greatness and glory to pious and excellent mothers, who early instilled into their expanding minds the most sublime sentiments of the Deity, and his providential government of the universe—the most pure and exalted ideas of virtue and religion. Blessed is the son and daughter of such a mother; thrice blessed is such a mother herself; for she is blessed in the glory and happiness of her offspring—in the consciousness of innate virtue—in the prospect of eternal felicity. Happy is the community and the nation where such mothers abound. Our own country has her share of them; but would to heaven we had more! To such mothers we owe the heroes, the statesmen, and the patriots of the revolution. It was the counsel of such mothers that fired our young soldiers with indignity for their insulted rights, and inspired them with ardour and confidence in the field of battle.

The wise monarch of old most justly observes of a virtuous and intelligent woman, that "her price is far above rubies; the heart of her husband doth trust in her;" for "she will do him good, and not evil, all the days of her life." He tells us also, that the husband of such a woman is honoured and respected, on account of his wife's virtues. "Her husband," says Solomon, "is known in the gates, when he sitteth among the elders of the land." But, above all, "her children arise up and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praiseth her."

If there were no other inducement than this single consideration, that the husband of a virtuous and intelligent woman is honoured for her sake, it ought to be sufficient to make young men wary in the choice of a wife. But there are other and still more weighty considerations—their own happiness, the happiness of their children, domestic tranquillity, reputation, pecuniary comfort, the periods of affliction and deprivation, the times of sickness, the hour of death. The pillow of disease, and even a dying bed, become soft and easy when smoothed by the hand of a virtuous and affectionate wife, to whose care and tenderness the sufferer can trust his orphans with confidence.

Under such considerations, let every young man, whose inclinations lead him to enter the holy and honourable state of matrimony, be wise, wary, and watchful in the selection of a partner for life, before he suffers that gordian knot to be woven which no hand can untie, and nothing but the stroke of death can sever. The important objects of his inquiry ought not to be whether the lady be beautiful, accomplished, or wealthy, but whether she possess those superior qualifications which naturally form the amiable wife, the exemplary mother, the unchanging friend—virtue, intelligence, and a good temper. "Seek ye first" these three things, and you will soon acknowledge, with rapture and gratitude, that all the others are "added thereto."

Editorial quarrels.—As far as our observations upon the subject have extended, we have been able to discover no satisfactory reason why an editor should not be a gentleman. Although to peruse the "written insults" which daily go the rounds of the country, one would imagine that instead of gentlemen, the press was managed by common street-brawlers. Names are wantonly dragged before the public, and they who in private interviews demean themselves towards each other according to the strictest rules of politeness, abandon every thing in the shape of courtesy the moment they appear in print. Thus, public journals destined to travel around the globe, are filled with gross personal abuse, which, if whispered to the individual against whom it is circulated, would probably create the most fatal consequences. As if an oral remark, uttered where the party is known, and confined to the hearing of a few, were more base in its nature, or pernicious in its effects, than the multiplied and exaggerated calumnies which, by means of the press, are so widely extended.

Brooklyn Collegiate Institute for Young Ladies.—This spacious and elegant brick edifice, on Brooklyn Heights, will be opened on Monday. We presume in no part of our country have so much enterprise and liberality in behalf of female education been displayed as by the citizens of Brooklyn, who have expended about thirty thousand dollars on the above institution. It will be under the charge of Messrs. I. & J. I. Van Doren, for whom it was erected. These gentlemen have had several years experience in their profession, and from their past reputation we have much to expect. It may be justly questioned if another situation for a female seminary could be selected in the country combining so many advantages. And more especially does its proximity to this city, its delightful situation, and purity of air, recommend it to particular patronage. The course of instruction is very extensive, embracing all the elegant as well as useful departments of physical and mental education. The prospects are truly flattering for such an infant institution. It is expected to open with about one hundred and thirty pupils.

May-day.—Our paper is this week dated on the first of May, the most memorable day out of the three hundred and sixty-five, in this city. All the people will be emigrating, and all the editors will be extremely humorous and jocular on the occasion. Having to remove our household gods and goods, we have not time to be as witty as we undoubtedly would have been had the fates ordained that we should only have had the pleasure of laughing at our neighbours instead of sharing in their troubles, and having others laugh at us. We are choked with dust and dirt, and though in a condition to say a great many dry things, we feel our natural amiability of temper too much ruffled to give them to the world.

Charade.—The answer to the charade in the forty-first number of the Mirror is—WOMAN. It was accidentally omitted in our last.

SLEEP ON THY PILLOW.

COMPOSED BY A. LEE.

ANDANTE.

Sleep on thy pil-low, Hap-py and light, As the moon on a bil-low, Re-po-ses at night; Soft be the slum-bers That cra-dle thy heart, As the ho-li-est num-bers That love can im-part.

Ad Lib. DA CAPO.

DA CAPO.

SECOND VERSE.

Wake on the morrow,
Lovely and meek,
And the morning shall borrow
Its blush from thy cheek;
Fresher than roses,
Thy lip's balmy gale,
There zephyr reposes,
New sweets to inhale.
Wake on the morrow, &c.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE GRAVES.

MAN is a vision that fades away,
Earth is a measureless golgotha—
Countless and crowded the graves that be
'Neath the green-grass turf and the solemn sea!

Wend thee away to the polar zone,
Where winter scowls from his awful throne,
Where darkness and terror and tempest are,
And the lone wild grave shall meet thee there.

Wend thee away to the tropic bowers,
Where summer sleeps on her fadeless flowers;
Where nature smiles with her sweetest air—
The shroud and the charnel, alas, are there!

Some are found in the forest glen,
Where the avalanche broke o'er the haunts of men;
Or the crater poured its lava flow,
Or the earthquake hurled the hills below.

Some are found 'neath the greenwood-tree,
Where the wild-bird warbles his melody;
While the pleasant voice of the summer stream,
Chanteth the sleepers' requiem.

Some in the green hills' slopes are hid,
And some in the crumbling pyramid;
Some in the desert's voiceless gloom,
Where swept the wing of the dark simoom.

Some are scooped in the mountain rock,
Unscathed by time or the tempest's shock;
Some are formed of the marble pile,
And some deep delved 'neath the sounding aisle.

Fearful the show of the graves that are
Where the city hath laid its sepulchre;
But far more fearful the charnel scene,
Where the battle's crimsoned sword hath been.

Wend thee away to the wild expanse,
Where the winds and the sleepless waters dance;
Where the buried treasures of ages lie
In the mid-sea caves—what meets thine eye?

Deep where the pearl and the coral grows,
In their gardens of beauty and still repose,
Where the mermaid waves her flowing hair
Mid the proud ship's spars—the graves are there!

Far where the mad'ning surges break
O'er the sullen iceberg's frowning peak;
Where the maelstrom roars by the kraken's lair—
The graves of the lost and loved are there.

Man is a vision that fades away,
Earth is a measureless golgotha;
Countless and crowded the graves that be
'Neath the green-grass turf and the solemn sea! PROTEUS.

TO FANNY.

Fanny! thou art young and gay,
'Tis true thou'rt handsome, dear;
Yet do not smile at what I say,
But rather shed a tear,
That I may see thine eyes of blue,
Shining through mists of pearly hue.

I would not tell thee thou art bright,
And beautiful beside;
And that thy glance is like the light
From the stars at even-tide;
But, Fanny! thou dost know it well,
My words will not increase the spell.

And once, dear Fanny, I was young,
Perchance I'd beauty too,
And heard my praises said and sung—
I had a lover true—

But now stern time has dress'd my hair,
And placed his silvery frost-work there.

Dear Fanny! think not to evade
His chilling presence long;
But stay—my muse too oft has stray'd
From the flowery paths of song;
And now its step, with airy grace,
A joyous minuet shall trace.

Thou art happy—mayst thou be Ever glad some, pure, and free;
And thy footstep fall as light
As the dew descends at night;
While thy voice, like music sweet,
Every passing year shall greet.

CORA.

INDIAN SONG.

"When the red-star shall gleam on the waters, I'll seek
"The hut of my love," sang an Indian cacique.
'Twas Waltoogah, a chief of the Algonquin race,
The tiger of battle, and the deer of the chase.
"The Cayuga ne'er rush'd with more haste to its prey
"Than I to my Tai, when the moon beams her ray;
"And swiftly as glides the canoe o'er the wave,
"She'll rush to the arms of her Waltoogah brave.
"Her bright eye will sparkle, as enraptur'd it dwells,
"On my present of beavers and bracelets of shells;
"On the skins which I bring her the wigwam to grace,
"With the flesh of the moose-deer I've killed in the chase.
"Then she'll bound to her hut, like a spirit of air,
"And spread 'neath the beach-tree the best of her fare;
"Her smiles and her cheer will my bosom clate,
"I'll sing of her charms, or of battles relate;
"I'll number the scalps I've ta'en from the foe,
"And name all the chiefs I've singly laid low;
"I'll recount all the dangers I've 'scaped in the fight,
"Till the first beams of day on the mountain shall light;
"The kiss of affection I'll press on her cheek,
"And speed to the chase," sang the Indian cacique. D.

AN EPISODE.

Fragile her form and meek her face,
In semblance of the Grecian mould,
Such as a painter loves to trace
From statues, half divine, of old;
And then her ever wistful eye,
Beam'd softer from its azure dye;
While her sweet voice, so silvery clear,
Like tones of music charm'd the ear.

We met—it was at silent hour—
A languid star-light fill'd the sky;
Fraught with the breath of many a flower,
The night-winds listlessly went by.
We linger'd 'neath a green recess,
As pondering more we spoke the less—
For thoughts and hearts had stray'd above,
Where "love is heaven—and heaven is love."

We parted—can I e'er forget
She was my first love and my last?
Ah, if we two had never met,
My life had not thus sadly past.
We parted—wouldst thou question why?
My rank was low—hers proud and high.
But will the pomp that wealth imparts,
Compare with ever-constant hearts?

They speak her joyous—be it so—
She well deserves a happy lot;
And much it gladdens me to know—
Of one forgone, but not forgot—
That she has found, and still can find
Amid the world, repose of mind.
And should this heart be doom'd to break,
It matters not—hers does not ache.

GETA.

MUSIC.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.

When through this weary waste we stray,
And mourn to see each joy depart,
The strain we loved in childhood's day
Has still the power to cheer the heart.
The well-known accents strike the ear,
And thrilling raptures seize the breast;
Pale, silent sorrow dries her tear,
And frantic madness sinks to rest.
Music divine! thy voice is heard,
And hope and joy illumine the soul;
Ah! why should passion speak by word,
Since music's power exhales the soul?
The words of friendship oft deceive,
False are the oaths that lovers bind;
Music, in thee we must believe,
For thou art constant, true, and kind.

J. A. T.

GEORGE F. MORRIS, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

Published every Saturday, at 163 William-street, between Beekman and Ann-streets.—Terms four dollars per annum, payable in advance.
No subscription received for a less period than one year.

Digitized by Google

NEW-YORK MIRROR,

AND LADIES' LITERARY GAZETTE.

VOLUME VII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 8, 1880.

NUMBER 44.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

LINES

Suggested on reading the beautiful lines of Bryant,

"Is this a time to be cloudy and sad?"

Ay! this is a time to be cloudy and sad,
When our mother nature sighs around;
When the far-off heavens no longer look glad,
And sadness breathes from the frozen ground.

There are notes of woe in the chilling blast,
And a waiting tone is heard from the sky;
And the spirit of storms is hurrying past,
Shaking snow from his mantle while he flits by.

The dark clouds are veiling the regions of space,
And unfurling their banner of wrath o'er the vale;
And here they stretch to the airy chase,
And there they roll on the mighty gale.

There's a stir of the limbs in that aspen bower,
There's a moaning of winds in that beechen tree;
Not a smile's to be seen in this darksome hour—
But a frown on the earth, the sky, and the sea.

The sun hides his face and withdraws his glad smiles,
And the eye looks in vain for one sunny ray;
The waters are bound, and snow covers the isles,
There is nothing to while my gloom away. CORA.

"THERE IS A TONE."

There is a tone of anguish
O'er the cold sleeper's rest,
"Why may not morning shine on thee,
Thou whom we loved the best?"

Thou sepulchre! there dwells a cloud
Of withering coldness over thee:
Wrapped in the chill and lonely shroud,
The good, the beautiful, the free,
Sink powerless 'neath the icy link,
Which, thrown across their being's brink,
Is for them, in the calm or storm,
When life is withering or warm;
When hope sheds forth its sunny glow,
Or moulders in the heart below;
Is for them, in the lightning scath,
Or mid the flowers around their path.
Yet for the hours whose light has fled
From the gay of heart, the reveller,
For they who seek among the dead,
The last the spirit cherished,
Thou hast a rest, thou sepulchre! HINDA.

POPULAR TALES.

A SPANISH TALE.

IN THREE CHAPTERS—CHAPTER THE LAST.

THE DONNA ROSANNA stood with her breath checked, as people do at the sight of something beyond belief. She then waved her hand for the Gitana to approach, and hastily pressed her lips two or three times between the girl's eyes, who soon left the apartment. The lady then sat down by the casement, and continued counting the jessamine blossoms up and down. At length the duenna muttered, "All this is very strange—very surprising—very strange;" and this she repeated for at least five minutes, holding up her embroidery to the light, and then laying it down again, glancing towards the chair.

"Of what are you talking now?" said her lady at last.

"I was only," replied the duenna, "thinking where this Gitana could have got her compliment. Unless I am much mistaken I have read it in the Academia de Cortesia."

"It is impossible," said the lady.

"It may be so; but it is, I think, true, nevertheless," rejoined the duenna.

"Duenna," retorted the lady, "I have a great mind to send you back to Segovia."

The duenna was now silenced. But in about a quarter of an hour after, when the storm seemed to be blown over, she observed, as to herself, "What will the captain-general say to all these pedlars and Gitanas?"

"That you are a suspicious old woman," pronounced the lady Rosanna, as quick as lightning. This was more than any woman could well bear, and peculiarly a duenna. "I thank heaven," said she, squeezing up her embroidery into her hand, and pushing back her chair, as if she were going out of the room at the instant. "I was never in love, however. I know nothing about love."

"From my soul I believe you," said the lady, with a look at the duenna's withered physiognomy; and then at once turning away, and with her handkerchief to her eyes, she went into her chamber.

What passed during the next day I cannot tell; but I suppose there was not much time for talking of love affairs; for about noon the captain-general came galloping into the court with half a dozen aides-de-camp at his heels; and he had scarcely set down before every servant in the convent was summoned to tell what could be told of the pedlar, the conjuror, and the Gitana. But all that was told was but little; or, as the servants thought, much to their honour; for besides giving them very pleasant entertainment by their tricks and gaiety, they had refused to take a peseto from any of them, and had even given away several Estremadura watch-chains and hair-nets, besides two of the best mock topaz necklaces that had been seen since the fair of St. Ines, to the waiting-maids of their lady and the duenna. The captain-general only knit his brows the more; and an aide-de-camp was despatched to bring the strangers from the village. I have often thought that it was the duenna who had sent for the cunning old man; and that afterwards she was not much pleased with her work, for he scolded her in the most provoking manner.

The aide-de-camp returned late that night without any intelligence. No one had seen either pedlar, conjuror, or Gitana, for the last fortnight; and it was notorious that all that tribe had gone to the north and Madrid for the season. The lady Rosanna remained shut up in her chamber. A second and a third day passed, probably in the same way; the captain-general running about the house, despatching aides-de-camp to the villages in the neighbourhood, and now and then making a sortie, as he termed it, to reconnoitre the corners and crevices of the wall. Nothing could be more hateful than this life to the duenna, who felt all her authority taken out of her hands, and had nothing to do but to see her lady one while reading some volume of poetry, as if her soul were at her lips, then throwing away the book, and hanging over a drawing, and then, as if she were bewitched, taking her harp, and singing the Mastranza. The duenna was almost tired to death of this song, and on the third evening prevailed on her lady to walk in the garden. It was by this time twilight, and the new moon was rising over the mountains, with the evening star just below it, like the diamond spark hanging from a huge pearl ear-ring. The ground was extensive, and was planted with vines, and an abundance of other garden trees, some in blossom, and some hanging down to the grass with fruit, and through these sweet-scented walks the house was now and then seen at a distance, with all the long, old casements open for the night air, and the servants hurrying backwards and forwards, in their gay dresses, with lights, preparing to lay the tables for supper. I think the whole might have been like a stage-scene, looked at through the large end of a telescope, or a feast in the land of the fairies.

After they had lost the sounds of the house, "I wonder," said the lady Rosanna, "whether we shall ever have wings?"

"Bless me," exclaimed the duenna, making the sign of the cross upon her forehead, "what would your ladyship do with them?"

"Duenna," sighed she, "I may have them before you are aware; there is not a star above us that I will not visit; I will look for some bright, quiet spot, into which no memory of this world can reach, and there—"

"In the name of the virgin, of what is my lady dreaming?" said the duenna.

But her lady heard nothing, and with her eye fixed on the heavens, seemed talking to some visible thing. The only words that could be heard were—"Where all tears are wiped from all eyes." They had not gone above a dozen yards farther, when something dark flew through the air, and dropped at their feet. There it lay, but neither of them had power to touch it. At length the lady Rosanna gathered courage, and took up the packet, notwithstanding the duenna's terrors, who declared it to be some new device of the tempter.

"If it be," observed the lady, with a faint laugh, "duenna, you are undone, for to you this temptation will be irresistible." And she held out to the duenna her large velvet purse, who found its contents safe, and kissed every dura, one after the other. The donna Rosanna's purse next came forth.

"I vow," exclaimed the duenna, "those are the most gentlemanlike thieves I ever met with. I have heard of such things, but it was in the Historia de la Lealdad, and the like stories of times and people, that, on my conscience, I believe never existed."

"My ring, my ring!" cried out the lady Rosanna, with a voice of agony.

"Are the ducats all right," interposed the duenna, taking the purse, and pouring out the gold into her open hand. "I'll be sworn that not a piece has been lost."

"Would to heaven," wept the lady, "all had been lost, and my ring left. My precious ring!"

"Mere emerald," muttered the duenna.

The lady Rosanna cast her bright eye in every corner of the path, saying, as if without knowing she spoke, "It was never off my finger till that day, that unfortunate day. I wore it on the night of the Mastranza. It was touched by his hand, it was pressed by his lips. It has been for two long years my companion, my delight, my misery! Still she searched through every tuft of the flowers that had in this farther part of the garden overgrown the path. At once she stopped, listened for a moment, and then sprang away like a startled fawn.

"Bless my soul," said the duenna, as she fought her way through the thicket, that seemed to have an ill-will against her, for she no sooner pushed one of the bushes out of the way than a dozen flew into its place, "Bless my soul, but those young girls are all flint and steel; mad passions from top to toe. And here am I, at this hour of the night, without cloak or comfort, netted like a wild beast among these brambles." The last idea struck strongly on her fancy; and as she had heard of the traps laid for some foxes, that had been lately in the grounds, she cried aloud, but all the world seemed to have grown deaf. However, she at length saw a glimpse of light through the branches; it was the lamp of the pavilion, and after a few struggles more and an ave, she made her way to the building. She there found the lady Rosanna clinging to one of the pillars, like a fair statue carved of its marble. Her hands were stiff, and as cold as ice, but her lips burned and quivered, and her eyes flashed with spiritual brightness. The sound of some instrument was heard, and the duenna looked round for an apparition of at least a dozen cavaliers muffled up to the eyes, with flapped hats, hanging feathers, and every man a sword or guitar in his hand; but she could see nothing more than the huge old vine waving in the moonlight, with all its leaves as if turned to silver. The sound came from beyond the garden wall, and she caught the closing words.

But her eyes were like thine own—
But her heart was—Oh, farewell!

"My curse light on the Mastranza, and all the makers and singers of such villainous tunes," exclaimed the duenna; "I have been doing nothing but dreaming of it these three nights. For the virgin's sake, my lady, leave this damp place, and come into the house at once." She tried to remove her from the spot, but she might as easily have moved the pavilion. There the fair creature stood in wild and delicate beauty, with her small white arms clung around the pillar, among the clusters of roses; her face upturned, pale as ivory in the moonshine, and her rich, raven curls flung back from her ears, listening like an enchanted being. In a minute or two some loud talking, followed by a clash of swords, was heard; she gave a shriek—her arms sank from the pillar—and, after a few loose and headlong steps towards the sound, she fell on the turf without motion.

What happened for the rest of the evening I could never learn, nor how the duenna contrived to carry her unfortunate mistress into the house, for she could not be much under sixty, though she confessed only to forty, and never exceeded that age in my memory. The lady Rosanna was, however, carried into her chamber, and there was great disturbance in the house for some hours. It was said that there had been an attack of banditti, of which the captain-general had information, that some had been killed, and others taken in chains to the corregidor in Valencia. At all events, about midnight the captain-general set off for the city at full speed, leaving all his servants armed, with strict orders to keep watch. "Is my father gone?" said the lady Rosanna, as the horse's heels echoed down the court-yard. These were the first words that she had uttered to any living soul from the time of her swoon.

The duenna, who, though she was a hard-featured woman, was not without affection, threw her arms round the lady, and, bursting into tears, thanked all the saints in the calendar for her recovery.

"The captain-general is gone," said the old woman; "but why does my sweet young lady ask that question?"

The lady Rosanna returned no answer, but, rising from her bed, began to bind up the long tresses that hung over her beautiful bosom, like wreaths of black satin. She then took from a secret drawer a small diamond-hilted dagger, drew it out of the sheath, looked at it two or three times before the hilt, then kissed it, and, putting it in the sheath again, hid it in her bosom.

The duenna saw all this going on, but through astonishment and fear did not speak a word. At length her lady went to the mirror, and gazing at herself for a moment, (and the duenna afterwards said, that from what reason she knew not, she had never seen her look so beautiful,) turned away with a melancholy smile, as if she had taken a last farewell of her loveliness, threw her mantilla over her head, and, with a motion of her hand for the duenna to stay behind, went down stairs.

The old woman afterwards said, that she had no power to follow her; but that, for a while, something like a cloud came over her mind, and she thought that she had seen a departing angel. She was roused by a glare of light through the chamber; and, on going to the window, saw a crowd of servants with torches round the Walloon, who was bearing something in his arms, and forcing his way up the hall. Altogether, they made a great clamour. She threw on her mantilla, and went down. By this time the Walloon had made his way in. The first object she saw was her lady, in the midst of the crowd, standing beside the great table; and, with a face as pale as ashes, slowly raising the cloak off the face of what seemed one of the dead banditti. For half-a-dozen years after the duenna was famous for telling the story of that night; how grave and calm her lady looked as she gazed on the countenance; how she took the ring from his finger—the emerald ring—and holding it up to heaven, as if in token of marriage, kissed it, and put it on her own; then, cutting off the longest of her own ringlets, laid it on his bosom; how a blush, like fire, covered her face and bosom when she turned round, and saw that the room was full.

"If I had minded her then," said the duenna, "I should have gone away with the rest, for she waved her hand, as if there were a sceptre in it. I would not, however, leave her with a corpse, but staid watching near the door. I believe that, as I stood in the shade, and made no noise, she thought I had gone away: for then she flung herself upon the body, weeping bitterly, and saying a thousand strange things; from which I learned, that she had met him at the Mestranza masquerade in Granada, when he had given her the ring, though he had not seen her face; that she had been unhappy ever since; that she thought she had seen his spirit some evenings before, and felt herself under a fate to follow him; with many more wild speeches of the same kind. At length I saw her kneel down, and, after a prayer, draw the little poniard from her bosom. As she raised it up, I knew it by the glittering of its hilt, and ran forwards with an outcry. She was probably frightened by the noise, for she dropped the weapon on the floor, and fell into my arms. I was then in a comfortable situation, with a dead man before me, and a dead woman hanging over my shoulder. However, the virgin and San Iago, the gentlest couple among all the saints, protected me, and I had scarcely cast my eye from my lady on the bandit, when I saw the colour come into his lips; then came a deep sigh; and before I could stir a step, with the weight upon me, he opened his eyelids and stared full in my face. I protest I thought I should have died. But here again I was mistaken." The duenna's story ended in her leaving the bandit, Don Francisco, to tell over his adventures to Donna Rosanna; how he had seen her in the garden; how he had obtained admission as the pedler; how he and the hussar had acted the gitana and the conjurer; how, on his last serenade, he had been taken for a robber; and how he was to win the captain-general's sword, on her promise of marriage. Whether the lady refused to help him in his wager, I leave to be decided by all the black-eyed and rosy-cheeked girls on both sides of the Pyrenees. For my own part, I have nothing more to say, than that I am ready to agree with the decision of the prettiest, whatever that may be; and that I thank all the senors present for listening to an old man's old tale. Blackwood's Magazine.

LITERARY NOTICES.

VISIT TO GREECE AND CONSTANTINOPLE.

THIS volume is the production of Mr. H. V. Post, one of the agents appointed by the New-York Greek committee, for the distribution of a cargo of the necessities of life, "among the suffering people of that country," which had been raised by voluntary contributions in the year 1827.

In the prosecution of this trust, Mr. Post had ample opportunities for observing the actual condition of Greece, and of studying the character of the people; advantages of which he has availed himself with no ordinary degree of success: the result has been the publication of the present volume, which we have no doubt will be read with interest, affording as it does, much local and general information respecting the habits and manners of the modern Greeks.

The work is executed in the journal style, which is well adapted for the introduction of innumerable anecdotes, entertaining in their character, and illustrative of the manners of the people it describes. The facts immediately connected with Mr. Post's arduous duty, are in some cases painfully interesting, from the extreme suffering and misery which they substantiate, as experienced by the wretched recipients of the bounty he was commissioned to distribute. It must however be gratifying to those who aided in furnishing the assistance, to learn how efficacious and seasonable was the relief afforded to thousands of half famishing and despairing human creatures. And although the rich and powerful among the Greeks did not exhibit any strong degree of gratitude towards the benefactors of their countrymen, it is pleasing to learn that the poor people uniformly evinced the highest sense of thankfulness for the friendly aid they had received.

In addition to the account of Greece, is subjoined a narrative of Mr. Post's visit to Smyrna and Constantinople, which will be found very interesting at this period, when every fact relative to the "sublime porte" is eagerly sought after, as illustrating the rapid progress the Turks are making in the manners and habits of European nations; more particularly in their adoption of the mode of warfare, practised by their christian neighbours, all of which is ably depicted by Mr. Post, and we can safely recommend the work as a valuable accession to the information already before the public, regarding these beautiful portions of the globe.

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW.

THIS valuable periodical fully sustains, under its present editor, the high reputation which has been hitherto awarded to it both in this country and in Europe. Its remarks on the foreign and domestic policy of the United States are liberal, manly, and well calculated to harmonize discordant opinions, and reconcile transient differences and local jealousies. Its views of general politics have been uniformly characterized by their comprehensive sagacity and humane spirit, and hence its sentiments are received with unmingled deference by foreigners, and frequently quoted in their journals with decided approbation. On literary subjects its tone is equally elevated and pure. While it metes out a full share of approbation to the writers both in prose and verse of the modern school, it retains a just and reverential preference for the classic standards of English literature, and claims, with a pardonable, nay commendable pride, our common participation with the inhabitants of the fast-anchored isle, in the honours of their ancestry. Towards the writers of this country, the North American has ever evinced a liberal indulgence, untinctured by idle vanity or local partialities. Of these favourable characteristics, which have long since gained the approval and support of the literary public, the last number (for April) contains unequivocal evidences. The articles are judiciously selected and treated with great ability and tact. Among the most prominent are those on education, the politics of Europe, and the early diplomatic history of the United States. The second we read with much interest and pleasure, and we can safely recommend it as full of general information, sound opinions and liberal sentiments.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

(Translated from the French of M. Thomas, for the New-York Mirror.)

CHAPTER ON EULOGIES.

EULOGIES are very ancient; their origin is to be traced to the first hymns sung in honour of the Deity. These hymns were inspired by admiration and gratitude. Man, when first placed on the earth, must have been struck with the spectacle which nature unfolded to his view. The amplitude of the heavens, the depth of the forests, the boundless extent of the ocean, the rich variety and productive fertility of the plains, the countless multitude of beings in motion, destined to serve for the ornament of this habitable globe—this entire and vast assemblage of objects must have conveyed an emotion of indescribable grandeur into his soul. Another sentiment must soon have succeeded to this first one. He could not fail to perceive, that with this so bountiful nature his relations were numerous and intimate. The stars dispensed to him their light; abundant fruits to nourish him sprung up under his feet, or spontaneously fell into his lap; the trees lent him their grateful shade, and offered him an asylum for his repose; the skies, during his hours of sleep, were covered as with a veil, and emitted only a softened and tempered light. Wondering at so many admirable contrivances, he could not but be conscious that the source of them was not in himself; he intuitively perceives that they are the work of a being invisible to his eye, but sufficiently manifested by his benevolence. He seeks for him athwart the wide world; he calls for him in the heavens and the earth, and hopes to find him in every surrounding object; he strains his ears, that he may catch his voice. Filled with the religious awe which instinctively arises in his heart, he blends his voice with that of nature, and from the lofty mountain top, or in the depth of the valley, to the accompaniment of rivulets or torrents, he sings aloud his first hymn to the glory of the Deity, whose presence is felt, and who is the cause of his being.

The first hymn thus sung in the solitude of the world formed a grand era in the history of man. Soon were parents seen to assemble their offspring in the open fields, to unite with them in rendering the same homage. The aged, in the midst of their plentiful harvests, were seen holding a blade of corn with one hand, and pointing with the other to heaven, to teach their families to praise the God who gave them nourishment.

In these early times, God was worshipped at the rising of the sun. That hour was regarded as a species of new creation, which restored the universe to man after having withheld it from him in the darkness of the night. Praise was also rendered on the approach of night, because its obscurity and its silence were the harbingers of fear; it was renewed at the commencement of the year, and of the seasons, and at every new moon. It would seem, that in the early periods of the world, man, not understanding the course of nature, was astonished at each successive moment of his existence, that her benefits were not withdrawn. The disorder, too, which he perceived to exist in the more savage and rude parts of the earth, caused him to set a higher value on the constant order which pervaded the heavenly appearances.

In after times, and amongst the most polished nations, whenever an unexpected blessing or curse fell upon them, every where was the praise of the Deity heard to resound. Thus history informs us, that it was chiefly during the existence of grievous epidemic diseases and cruel wars, after great battles had been lost, or pestilence had destroyed thousands upon thousands, and when the people believed that they saw pale and terrific spectres spreading desolation through the cities, it was then that the priests, in the temples and at the feet of the altars, surrounded by multitudes, and raising with one imploring accord their uplifted hands to the skies, composed and sang new hymns.

In these times of fear, the hymns were inspired by the imagination, and breathed forth the greatest enthusiasm. Man, then at the mercy of nature, conceived ideas the more sublime in proportion to the consciousness of his own weakness. All was exaggerated around him; his expressions rose with his ideas; he described every object in the strongest colours, he borrowed images from all creation to praise the being to whom creation itself was subjected. His style was often mysterious, like the nature of him whom he addresses; he sought an unknown harmony in sounds; and, as if to give the divinity a local habitation, he erected columns, and dug vaults, and traced out porticos; as if to represent him, he enlarged the proportions, and marked out imposing figures in his architecture: as if to approach him on his festivals, he substituted cadenced movements and measured steps for his ordinary walk; he improved and perfected his language; and finally, joining poetry to music, he created in his honour a distinct language.

All nations have had their hymns. Their peculiar desires, wants, vices or virtues, have influenced them in the choice of the attributes which they selected for the subjects of their praise. "I praise thee," cries out the savage inhabitant of Greenland, "O thou, who with thy invisible hand, bringest every year the whale within the reach of my harpoon, and causest his blood to dye the ocean-wave, to assist me in tracing his course as he speeds him from the shores." At the other extremity of the earth, the Indian thus sings under his genial skies: "I praise thee, who causest harvests of rice to grow in my savannahs, and the citron and the orange on the banks of my brooks." On the borders of eastern Russia, another savage nation thus lifts its tones, under the influence of its volcanoes: "I adore and praise thee, O powerful and terrible being, who dwellest in these subterranean fires, and thence belchest forth thy flames amidst our snows and glaciers." Thus in every nation their hymns partake of the nature and colouring of their climate; and a savage or genial influence impressed by external circumstances, upon his sensation and ideas, characterises their notions of a deity.

Many of the hymns of the ancients have been preserved to our times. The country in which Homer sang, and Orpheus instituted his mysteries, and architecture elevated temples, the ruins of which we still throng to admire, and the chisel of Phidias seemed enabled to endue his marble with deity—that country, of which the sky, the very ground and the waters seemed impressed as divine, must have produced a great number of hymns in honour of the gods. The greater number of them were, however, disfigured by fables and fairy tales, which aroused the mob, but disgusted the wise.

Homer, in his hymns, as in his epic poems, has celebrated his heroes better than his gods; they are rather monuments of pagan mythology than religious hymns. His master hand is, however, perceptible at times, as well as the charms of a most graceful poetry.

The hymns of Callimachus offer the same beauties and the same defects; genius is the slave to superstition and to popular error, which are extolled by it with equal harmony and grace.

No hymns of Pindar have come down to our times, but we know that they were all dedicated to Apollo at Delphi, whose oracles held in subjection the credulity of the multitude and the ambition of kings. Whilst the poets and the people degraded the divinity of their worship, the initiated rendered to him, in their sacred mysteries, a more pure and worthy homage. The tone of their hymns is imposing, but they were selfish, and forgot, in their prayers to one common parent, all who were not included in their own mystic circle.

If there is any one Grecian hymn that possesses the characteristics of grandeur and sublimity, it is that of the stoic philosopher, Cleanthus. This hymn, too little known, evinces a vigorous imagination, and a mind disenthralled from the superstitions of the times. It is worthy of the sect which furnished a prison to Epictetus, and to Antoninus a throne. Surrounded by his disciples, among whom kings disdained not to mingle, Cleanthus thus addresses the Supreme:

"O Thou who receivest many names, but whose power is infinite and single, sovereign of nature, who rulest over all and subjectest all, I bow before thee, since it is permitted to man to approach thee. All that live, or are mortals on the earth, owe their birth to thee, are a feeble likeness of thee—I will address to thee my hymns, I will not cease to sing in thy praise. This universe suspended over our heads, and which seems to move around the earth, obeys thy will; it progresses, but in silence are its motions directed by thee. The thunder, minister of thy laws, slumbers under thy insuperable restraint; at thy nod it rouses and causes itself to be heard, and all nature is struck with affright. Thou guidest the universal spirit which animates every living and moving being, so unlimited and supreme is thy sovereign power! Genius of nature, in the heavens, on the earth, on the ocean, nothing is produced or achieved without thy aid, excepting the evil which originates in the hearts of the wicked. Through thee chaos becomes order; through thee conflicting elements unite. Thou blendest that which is good, which is not in such complete harmony, that all is union and beauty. The wicked alone, secluded from the rest of beings, seek to interrupt and break this order. Miserable that they are, they seek happiness, but do not perceive the existence of an universal law, obedience to which would render them happy and good. Eschewing justice and virtue, they hurry each to the immediate objects of their desires, to notoriety, to vile riches, to seductive and treacherous pleasures. O God, who dispensed all gifts, to whom the storm and the thunder submit, remove from man this foolish error; deign to enlighten his soul, and inspire him with that reason which is thy own guide in the government of the world, in order that respecting ourselves, we may become worthy of honouring thee—of celebrating thy praise in endless hymns, as befits feeble and mortal beings. Neither the inhabitant of earth nor they who dwell aloft in the skies, can better employ their hours, than in adoring and hymning the sublime providence which, in the eternal spirit of justice, rules over the creation."

We have a few Roman hymns, or at least some fragments in the writings of their poets, which give us an idea of them; but they do not represent the Deity in eloquent or striking terms. The hymns which Horace composed for the secular games at Rome, exhibit great delicacy of taste, but they are far beneath the subject. A feast, established in honour of the revolution of ages, the idea of the divinity, for whom ages are but as a moment, the weakness of man, whom time devours, his labours which survive him but for a while, the succession of generations, the misfortunes and crimes which had occurred in the last century, an invocation for the coming age—it would seem that these ideas should have furnished Horace a theme full of eloquence and inspiration. But the more a nation is civilized the less enthusiasm does it possess. It is among a new people that the impression of nature and the idea of a divinity is strongest. It is also more fresh and lively among those who dwell in the open country than among the inhabitants of a pent up city. And this must be so. In cities man alone is seen, and the proud labours of man. The objects which surround you on every side are the edifices of his architecture, the metals that he has delved for in the earth, the riches which he has accumulated in his wanderings across the seas; in short, all that is fair and brilliant in the picture of society, united by human laws and human arts. In the country man disappears, and the Deity alone is manifest. The sky is every where upon the sight; the spectacle of both day and night is more imposing; the constant return of the seasons is felt more perceptibly in their outward grandeur of effect; the eye, viewing boundless distances, is struck with the extent of the universe, and with the power of Him who created it. It is not then to be wondered at, that the first nations of the world, and especially the oriental, who, inhabiting a delightful climate, and following a pastoral life, loved nature more, and gave to their religious hymns a tone of enthusiasm for which we may in vain look in more polished ages. In western climes, particularly in Europe, we commenced by being savages, enclosed in forests, and gloomy, under a friendless sky; we were then corrupted, and rendered barbarian by singular conjunctures of events and mingling of nations; we have finished by becoming refined, but remaining still corrupt. Hence our religious hymns are frigid, and want vigour. The only merit we can claim is mere purity of style.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

THE PROCESS OF MAKING ATTAR, OR ESSENTIAL OIL OF ROSES.—This celebrated essence is obtained from roses by a simple distillation, conducted in the following mode:—A quantity of fresh roses, (forty pounds, for instance,) with their calyxes, but with their stems cut short, are put into a still with sixty pounds of water. The mass is well mixed with the hands, and a gentle fire is made under the still. When fumes begin to rise, the cap is put on, and the pipe fixed; the chinks are luted; cold water is put into the refrigerator, and the receiver adapted. A moderate fire is continued; but, when the water begins to come over, it is gradually lessened. The distillation is carried on till thirty pounds of water are drawn off, which generally happens in about four or five hours. This rose water is poured upon forty pounds more of roses, and from fifteen to twenty pounds are drawn off by the same process as before. This cohobated rose water is poured into pans of earthenware, or tinned metal, and left exposed to the fresh air for a night; when the attar, or essence, will be found in the morning congealed and swimming on the surface of the water; it is to be carefully skimmed off, and poured into a vial. When a certain quantity has been thus obtained, the water and feces are to be separated from the clear essence. The first is easily done, as the essence congeals with a slight cold, when the water may be poured from it. The feces may then be made to subside, by keeping the essence fluid by heat. They are as highly perfumed as the essence. The rose water, after all the essence has been skimmed from it, is to be employed in future operations, instead of common water.

The very small quantity of essence obtainable from the roses in India, has caused various additions to be made in the distillation, particularly sandal wood; but this adulteration is discoverable by the flavour of the sandal, and the fluidity of the oil in common cold. In Cashmere a sweet-scented grass is used as an addition, which does not injure the perfume, but impedes its congelation. The proportion of pure essence yielded by the roses is very variable, from differences in the seasons, and in the manner of conducting the process. In India, three drachms from one hundred pounds of leaves is a large proportion. From a large field of roses there was procured only at the rate of two drachms to the hundred pounds.

The colour of the attar is no criterion of its quality. It was obtained green, yellow, and reddish, from roses of the same ground, but collected on different days. The calyxes do not impair the quality of the attar, nor give it a green colour.

SPECIFIC GRAVITY.—Hiero, king of Syracuse, having furnished a workman with a quantity of gold for making a crown, suspected that he had been cheated, and that the workman had used a greater alloy of silver than was necessary in the manufacture of it; he therefore applied to Archimedes for a detection of the fraud. This celebrated mathematician was led by chance to a method of detecting the imposture, and of determining precisely the quantities of gold and silver of which the crown was composed. While he was bathing in a tub of cold water, he observed that, as he immersed his body in it, the water ran out; and he immediately concluded, that, supposing the tub full, the water which ran out when his whole body was immersed, was equal in bulk to his body. Archimedes was so pleased with the discovery, as to run about the streets exclaiming, "I have found it!" The principle having thus suggested itself to Archimedes, he procured a ball of gold and another of silver, exactly of the same weight as the crown—considering that if the crown were altogether either of gold or silver, the balls of gold or silver would be of the same bulk, and consequently, when immersed in water, would raise it just as high as the crown would if immersed. And if, on the contrary, the crown was of gold and silver, mixed in a certain proportion, this proportion would be discovered by the height to which the crown would raise the water higher than the gold ball, or lower than the silver ball.

VINEGAR.—A German apothecary recommends the following method of manufacturing this very useful article. He put into a cask of sufficient dimensions, a mixture composed of forty-one pints of water, eight pints of whiskey, two pints of yeast, and two pounds of charcoal, and placed in a proper situation for fermentation. At the end of four months, a very good vinegar was found, as clear and as white as water.

OPERATION OF TAKING UP THE COMMON ILIAC ARTERY OF AN INFANT.—An operation has been performed within a few days, in this city, by Dr. Bushe, professor of anatomy in Rutgers college, on a child only two months old, for aneurism of the left labium, which threatened the almost immediate death of the child. As the pulsating tumour was made up of anastomosing branches from the external and internal iliacs, it was necessary to take up the common iliac artery. This was done by the professor with the greatest safety to the little patient, and without the loss of one ounce of blood. The tumour has shrunk away, and the child is doing well. This operation has never been performed on so young a subject before.

DIVERSITY OF COLOURS.—In a very amusing work of the celebrated Goethe, entitled, "Winklemann und seind Jahrhundert," it is stated, that about fifteen thousand varieties of colour are employed by the workers of mosaic in Rome, and that there are fifty shades of each of these varieties, from the deepest to the palest, thus affording seven hundred and fifty thousand tints, which the artist can distinguish with the greatest facility. It might be imagined, that with the command of seven hundred and fifty thousand tints of colour, the most varied and beautiful painting might be perfectly imitated; yet this it not the case, for the mosaic workers find a want of tints, even amid this astonishing variety.

FIRE AND WATER-PROOF CEMENT.—To half a pint of milk put an equal quantity of vinegar, in order to curdle it; then separate the curd from the whey, and mix the whey with the whites of four or five eggs, beating the whole together. When it is well mixed, add a little quick-lime through a sieve, until it has acquired the consistence of a thick paste. With this cement, broken vessels, and cracks of all kinds, may be mended. It dries quickly, and resists the action of fire and water.

AIR MATRESSES.—There is no end to the inventions of man. Mattresses, pillows, and chair-cushions filled with air, and possessing amazing elasticity, have recently been invented in England. Mr. Colien, of this city, has imported several specimens. They are quite curious and original.

METHOD OF DETECTING THE ADULTERATION OF TEA.—The Chinese frequently mix the leaves of other shrubs with those of the tea plant. This fraud is easily discovered by adding to an infusion of it, a grain and a half of sulphate of iron. If it is pure green tea, the solution, placed between the eye and the light, assumes a pale bluish tint; if it is bohea tea, the solution is blue, inclining to black; but if it is adulterated, it shows all the colours, yellow, green, and black.

INVISIBLE CEMENT.—Isinglass boiled in spirits of wine, will produce a fine transparent cement, which will unite broken glass, so as to render the fracture almost imperceptible, and perfectly secure.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

THE RAMBLER.—NUMBER XVI.

WASHINGTON IRVING.

"No man is a prophet in his own country"—"No man is a hero to his valet-de-chambre"—and an infinite number of similar proverbs that have been in use at all times, go far to prove that if proximity or familiarity with a celebrated man, does not generate indifference or contempt, it at least materially lessens the feeling of reverence and admiration with which those at a distance regard him. Mankind are great equalizers in intellectual matters. The littleness of human nature cannot endure that any thing with which it comes frequently in contact should enjoy an acknowledged superiority; and men, accordingly, take the most curious methods of bringing those who, in the eye of the world, are far above them, down to what they consider pretty nearly their own level. They concede their inferiority in some point of vital importance, but balance the account by their real or imagined superiority in trifles that they alone take note of; thus a "scurvy politician" will look with a certain degree of contempt upon a poet, whose "words are sparks of immortality," because he may be unacquainted with the minute particulars of an electioneering squabble between Tweedledura and Tweedledee, in the twelfth ward, and says, "though — is a great poet, he aint so smart at some things as some folks that don't pretend to nothing." True, this is the language of ignorant vulgarity, but it is a very common language for all that, and the same feeling and manner of reasoning is in constant operation in a thousand different ways. Men see the particular gifts of their friends and acquaintances with the naked eye, but look at their own excellences through a solar microscope. Probably Dr. Akenside was thought a great dunce by his companions in the slaughter-house, in consequence of his awkwardness in cutting short the career of oxen, sheep, and calves; and Robert Bloomfield, while composing his "Farmer's Boy" in a cobbler's stall, was sneered at by his fellow-apprentices for his unworkmanlike manner of repairing the wear and tear to which shoes are subject. The mere sight of a great man stumbling over a stone elevates the small beholder somewhat in his own conceit, and detracts from the perfectibility with which we clothe objects in the distance; and it is the same principle carried a little further which makes the monstrosities of antiquity so respectable, and the comparative peccadilloes of our own age so contemptible in the eyes of the present generation.

Now if Washington Irving at the present time kept a crockery store, and retailed pitchers and pipkins, or stood behind a tavern bar, and compounded mint juleps, gin slings, or other curious drinks, there might be some feasible way of accounting for the apathy with which both he and his works are regarded by the inhabitants of a city he has immortalized. But no—he has been for years separated from them, and been a wanderer in other lands. During his long absence not a whisper derogatory to his well-earned fame has reached them, while ever and anon the loud trump of European praise has come swelling over the Atlantic; but among his own countrymen there were no voices to re-echo and prolong the strain; it reached his native shores and died away. A few journalists were, from time to time, at the trouble of slightly expressing their admiration of a man who has done more for the literary character of their country than any other; but the most part contented themselves with copying fragments of foreign criticisms, and recommending them to the attention of their readers in three or four preliminary lines. And why is this? It really seems as if no person could get into notice in this country without connecting himself with political measures, and becoming the tool or organ of a party. Let a man go to congress, and make a long lumbering speech of twenty or thirty columns, about something or nothing, and he is straightway a "great man," a "giant in intellect;" he is greeted with fulsome flattery, and "base spaniel fawning," from all quarters, and the editors resort to the most outrageous similes and curious ways of putting the English language together for the purpose of expressing their inexpressible admiration. True, the tide soon changes, and he who is to-day their idol is to-morrow torn down and trampled under foot; but another takes his place—"another, and another, and another;"—whilst amid this setting up and pulling down, this din and turmoil about small men and small matters, such an ornament to his country as the author of the "Sketch Book" is but little thought of and less cared for!

It is truly astonishing, even among a great portion of the reading people of this city, to find how few have taken the trouble (or rather the pleasure) of perusing the whole of Irving's works; and among those who have, he appears to be held in but slight estimation, compared with the high standing he enjoys abroad. Yet his is a style which one would suppose could not fail in pleasing the most fastidious; so fresh and delicate, so sweet, so smoothly polished, that could even the ideas be taken away, the words would fall like music on the ear. How very unlike the tiresome pages of harsh or monotonous prose which Cooper is continually interposing between his half-a-dozen vivid pictures that make up a novel. The "Sketch Book" and "Bracebridge Hall" may not be of the highest order of writing, but they are perfect of their kind. They may be miniature gems, but they are of the first water. He must be a very unreasonable person indeed who wishes to read a better story than Rip Van Winkle; while the pure pathos of the Broken Heart, the Wife, and the Pride of the Village, is as simple, unstrained, and touching as can well be conceived. Every page Irving writes discovers the most refined and exquisite taste, and delicate perception of the beautiful. It looks as if it were impossible for him to construct a rough or gross sentence; and sometimes the language he employs is so singularly appropriate, that it seems as if the sentiment, as in many of Moore's Irish Melodies, could not be expressed by any other form of words. In the description of Sleepy Hollow, how felicitously does the language and ideas combine, and how drowsily do parts of the description fall upon the ear:

"Not far from this village, perhaps about three miles, there is a little valley, or rather lap of land among high hills, which is one of the quietest places in the whole world. A small brook glides through it, with just murmur enough to lull you to repose, and the occasional whistle of a quail, or tapping of a woodpecker, is almost the only sound that ever breaks in upon the uniform tranquillity.

"I recollect that when a stripling my first exploit in squirrel shooting was in a grove of tall walnut trees that shade one side of the valley. I had wandered into it at noon-time, when all nature is peculiarly quiet, and was startled by the roar of my own gun, as it broke the sabbath stillness around, and was prolonged and reverberated by the angry echoes. If ever I should wish for a retreat, whither I might steal from the world and its distractions, and dream quietly away the remnant of a troubled life, I know of none more promising than this little valley.

"From the listless repose of the place, and the peculiar character of its inhabitants, who are descendants from the original Dutch settlers, this sequestered glen has long been known by the name of Sleepy Hollow, and its rustic lads are called the Sleepy Hollow Boys throughout all the neighbouring country. A drowsy, dreamy influence seems to hang over the land, and pervade the very atmosphere. Some say that the place was bewitched by a high German doctor during the early days of the settlement; others, that an old Indian chief, the prophet or wizard of his tribe, held his powwows there before the country was discovered by Master Hendrick Hudson. Certain it is, the place still continues under the sway of some witching power, that holds a spell over the minds of the good people, causing them to walk in a continual reverie. They are given to all kinds of marvellous beliefs; have trances and visions, and see strange sights, and hear music and voices in the air. The whole neighbourhood abounds with local tales, haunted spots, and twilight superstitions; stars shoot and meteors glare oftener across the valley than in any other part of the country, and the night-mare, with her whole nine fold, seems to make it the favourite scene of her gambols."

In quaint, rich humour Irving is equal to almost any writer of the day. What glorious pictures has he given of the first Dutch settlers, and their dangerous coasting voyages around the island of Manahata—their domestic habits, and their extreme averseness from any thing like hurry in their public transactions. Perhaps these are not exactly faithful and correct likenesses, but they cannot be called caricatures. The humour of a caricature is broad and obvious, Irving's is quiet and subdued. They are pleasant exaggerations, and so completely devoid of malice, that even the most inveterate lovers of speck-un'-eyer and sour-cROUT must smile as they read. Very dissimilar from this are the attempts at wit and humour in Cooper's pages, where every thing remotely approximating to a joke seems to have been forced from the author by a species of mental galvanism, and, like other forced productions, proves a lamentable abortion. Yet the latter gentleman seems very partial to those painful efforts, and seldom lets the opportunity escape, in season or out of season, of making the trial. He seems situated like those persons who are under the necessity of being witty "when they can, not when they should," which frequently has no other effect than that of vexing his readers, and detracting from the admiration they would otherwise feel at his graphic descriptions of "the battle and the wreck." Whatever Irving has done seems to be incapable of improvement, and that any change must be for the worse. Doubtless much time and labour have been spent in bringing his writings to this state of perfection, but this is saying nothing against him; it only shows the fine taste and discrimination he possesses—that he knows what ought to be done, and does it. His works will probably float smoothly down the stream of time, while those of loftier pretensions, and, it may be, of greater men, sink into oblivion. He is the best of his class. No one has written so good a book as the "Sketch Book," of its kind; and no one has ever written, or ever will write a work similar and equal to "Knickerbocker's History of New-York," while there is every likelihood that his "Life of Columbus" will remain the best and most authentic account Americans and the world will possess of the discovery of this continent. When the claims of early American writers come to be discussed by posterity, it will be difficult to point out one entitled to rank above that of Washington Irving. C.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

PORTRAITS OF CELEBRATED CHARACTERS.

WILLIAM SHARP,*

The celebrated Line Engraver.

THIS distinguished engraver, perhaps the first of his day, is no less deserving of notice from the celebrity he attained in his profession, than for the singularity of his character and the peculiar religious principles he so pertinaciously adhered to during his life.

Mr. Sharp was born in the year 1749. His father was a respectable tradesman in London, a gunmaker, for which business young Sharp was originally designed. An early predilection for drawing induced his parents to abandon this intention, and at his own request he was articled to a writing engraver, in his native city. At the expiration of his indentures of apprenticeship, he began business on his own account, and received much encouragement. Mr. Sharp, in speaking of the humble commencement of his career, would frequently say, that his first essay in engraving was made on a pewter pot, and would then refer with honest pride to one of the splendid efforts of his graving tool, executed when he had arrived at the eminence he subsequently attained.

At the age of about thirty, he disposed of his business, and devoted himself entirely to a higher department of the art, in which he had now made considerable progress, by constantly employing himself in engraving the superior paintings of the old masters.

His merit first began to display itself in the Novelist's Magazine, for which work he executed several plates from the designs of Stothard. He also contributed one print to Southwell's folio Family Bible, "Moses striking the rock." The excellence of these several attempts in the graving art speedily brought him into notice, and the consequent patronage which he experienced fostered the talents he so eminently possessed. It would be uninteresting to trace him through this period, merely in relation to his professional life, we shall therefore only enumerate a few of the works which he has left behind, as splendid specimens of his excellence in the caligraphic art, and proceed to the more interesting particulars of his private character.

Among the finest of his engravings are "The doctors of the church disputing on the immaculateness of the virgin," from the picture of "Guido;" the plate from West's "King Lear in the storm," is a masterly example of line engraving, and is considered worthy of any school; a proof impression of this plate readily produces ten guineas. His portrait of Mr. John Hunter, the great anatomist, is thought to be one of the finest prints in the world. The magnificent print of "St. Cecilia," from Dominichino, is likewise an evidence of his great and masterly hand. "The witch of Endor," another of the powerful pictures of West, is also a splendid effort of his burine. Numerous other specimens might be instanced; these, however, may suffice, as proofs of the excellence he attained in line engraving; in the particular branch of which art it has been considered, by competent judges, that he has left no legitimate successor to his superior talents.

Sharp in his early life was a warm advocate for representative governments; kings and the clergy were excluded from his utopian system, and a president, &c. were to supply their places. These theories, dangerous, perhaps, in established governments, were more the result of a youthful imagination and a sanguine temperament, than the consequence of sober and mature reflection. In more advanced life the writer of this article was in habits of intimacy with this singular man, and is acquainted with the fact, that Sharp's principles were then materially changed on these subjects. To such an extent, however, had he carried his views at one time, that he was placed under arrest by the British government, and was summoned before the privy council, to be examined respecting his political principles, and to ascertain how far he had committed himself with Horne Tooke and others, with whom he was associated, and who were at that period about to take their trial for high treason. Sharp's jocular, bold, and handsome-looking countenance did not exhibit much of the appearance of a conspirator, a circumstance which impressed his judges much in his favour. Messrs. Pitt and Dundas on one occasion were present at these examinations, and plagued the artist excessively by their numerous questions, which Sharp said had no reference to the business. While the examination was pending, he deliberately took out of his pocket a prospectus for publishing his portrait of Horne Tooke, which he was then engraving, and handing it to Messrs. Pitt and Dundas, requested them to oblige him with their names as subscribers! The singularity of the proposal produced immoderate laughter in the council; and nothing having occurred in the course of the interrogations to criminate him, he was shortly afterwards liberated.

* In Moore's Life of Byron, first volume, will be found three letters from his lordship respecting this eccentric individual, and of his connection with the famous Joanna Southcott.

It has been before observed that Sharp's peculiar principles were directed alike to religion and politics. He had embraced the belief that the time was at hand when the prophecies in holy writ, respecting the restoration of the Jews, and the establishment of the millennium, were about to be accomplished. Impressed with these opinions, it may readily be imagined that he hailed with enthusiasm any indication of the fulfilment of his favourite theories. Towards the latter end of the last century, a man named Richard Brothers, laid claim to divine inspiration, styling himself "the king of the Jews," asserting that he was commissioned by heaven to collect the scattered tribes of that wandering race for the purpose of reinstating them in their ancient city of Jerusalem, where he was to preside over them as their promised Messiah. Numbers flocked around this self-inspired prophet, many of whom were men celebrated for their rank or talent; among the latter may be named Halhed, the distinguished oriental scholar, and the subject of this memoir. Sharp entered into the views of Richard Brothers with all the warmth which characterised him in the pursuit of his favourite opinions. He took the portrait of the embryo king, which he subsequently engraved, and became one of his firmest adherents and supporters. Brothers at length attracted the attention of government, and being considered insane, was placed in a private mad house, where he continued to the time of his death.

It may be supposed that the confinement and consequent exposure of this pretended prophet, would have opened the eyes of his deluded followers; on the contrary they still cherished the belief that he would be liberated by divine interposition, and fully perform his miraculous commission—an opinion which was further confirmed by a fresh aspirant for inspiration, who appeared in the person of the famous Joanna Southcott.

This extraordinary woman first came into notice about 1795. She was then in the service of a farmer residing near Exeter, and like her predecessor, Richard Brothers, claimed an immediate intercourse with heaven, declaring that she was the woman clothed with the sun, mentioned in the revelations—that the millennium was about to commence, with other extravagant assurances and pretensions, which our limits will not admit of narrating. The celebrity of this new prophetess soon attracted the notice of Sharp, and, we believe, about the year 1800 he determined upon transplanting her from the servile situation she held in Devonshire to London, where he then resided; a resolution he carried into effect, and for some time he maintained her at his own expense, and continued her zealous supporter and advocate until the period of her decease.

The singularity of Sharp's religious opinions occasionally tinged his professional pursuits. On the subject of physiognomy he held the strange belief that every man's face had the sign of the beast or some other animal in it, and that the disposition of the man was indicated by the resemblance the face bore to a lion, a tiger, an eagle, or a bull-dog—corresponding passions being predominant where these separate features were developed. Cobbett's profile he always likened to a bull-dog. He used to say of this notorious politician that "on whatsoever he fastened, there he would stick and worry it so long as there was any thing to worry." These singular opinions respecting physiognomy have induced him frequently to refuse engraving portraits of distinguished men, whose countenances did not indicate the peculiar traits he delighted in tracing in the human features, while others he worked at with extreme satisfaction who possessed the marked peculiarities of some particular animal.

Sharp, notwithstanding the eccentricities of his character, was universally esteemed by a numerous circle of friends which his talents and amiable disposition secured him to the last. His works are well known to his contemporary artists in Europe and America, and were so much admired that he was elected an honorary member of the Imperial Academy of Vienna, and of the Royal Academy at Munich. He died at Chiswick (in 1823, at the age of seventy-four,) to which place he removed a short time previous to his death, for the purpose of being interred near Hogarth, (who is buried in Chiswick church-yard) whom he esteemed as the most extraordinary painter that ever existed. H.*

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE POET'S SUPPER.

Gardez-vous d'imiter ce rimeur furieux,
Qui de ses vains écrits lecteur harmonieux,
Aborde en recitant quiconque le salue;
Et pourrait de ses vers les passans dans la rue:
Il n'est Temple si saint, des Anges respecté,
Qui soit contre sa muse un lieu de sûreté.—BOILEAU.*

MR. BENJAMIN BRIGGS, the junior partner of a thriving Manchester warehouse in the city, had an unfortunate propensity for tagging rhymes when he ought to have been examining piece-goods, knew much more of metaphors than muslins, arranged a distich with more interest than a diaper, and debased his faculties to tropes and similes, instead of giving up the whole force of his imagination to calicos and cottons. Upon the disease first manifesting itself, his seniors gave him the best advice, warned him of the dismal consequences that would inevitably ensue, if he suffered it to get ahead, formally declared that the credit of their house would not allow them to retain any person convicted of so uncivic and anti-commercial an offence, and announced their intention of dissolving the partnership if he abandoned himself any longer to such idle courses. Prudence dictated a seeming submission, but nothing was further from his thoughts than a final renunciation of the muse. He stole at intervals from the counting-house to Castalia, mounted Pegasus instead of his pulpit-desk, and absconded from the worship of Mammon to pay his secret adorations at the shrine of Apollo. The constraint to which he was subjected at home only made him the more communicable abroad. He laboured under a perfect incontinence of poetry, pouring his stanzas into every ear of which he could get possession, with such an unremitting copiousness, that his friends took alarm at his approach, and if they could not escape him altogether, generally forged some excuse for cutting him short in the midst of the most flimsy ode, or the very first scene of the most touching tragedy. Some he would slyly draw aside upon 'change under pretext of business, and make the blushing statue of Sir Thomas Gresham, or old Guy, privy to his inappropriate rhymes: others he would inveigle into an untenanted upper box at the play; and just as the ghost of Hamlet was describing how his murderer "poured juice of cursed hemlock in his ear," he would distil his own not less unwelcome strophes into his victim's auricle: while some, again, he would lure away on a Sunday from the park-promenade into the most lonely recesses of Kensington-Gardens; when, to their great horror and amazement, he would suddenly draw a tragedy from his pocket and discharge the whole of its contents at their head.

All these expedients being exhausted, and a regular audience becoming utterly hopeless, he at last hit upon the happy suggestion of inviting a few acquaintances of approved literary taste to sup with him at his lodgings in Wych-street, when he might, as a fair set-off for his lobsters, oysters, punch, and port wine, demand their opinions upon a poem which he meant to offer to the Royal Literary Society, in hopes of obtaining the fifty-guinea prize.

"As to attempting to write any thing," said Benjamin to his assembled guests, "upon such a subject as Dartmoor, which was the first they held out to public competition, I could not have bowed my genius to such a drudgery; you all know, gentlemen, what a blundering business was made of the second proposition, the Fall of Constantinople and Death of Constantine; but I have now submitted to their adoption a noble theme—the Capture of Rome by Alaric the Destroyer, and, in the anticipation that they might select it, I have already composed a few hundred lines, upon which I wished you to do me the kindness of offering your remarks with all the freedom and judgment which I may reasonably expect from such approved friends and competent critics."

* Boileau here alludes to the French poet Du Parrier, who, finding him one day at church, insisted upon reciting to him an ode during the elevation of the host.

Here he drew a large roll of paper from his coat-pocket, and a blank dismay instantly took possession of every face around him. Each saw the trap into which he had fallen, and each exerted himself to avert the threatened calamity.

"My dear sir," exclaimed Mr. Jibe, "this is so kind of you, I am sure I may answer for all present," (here he thrust his tongue into the cheek which was towards the company, and gave that side of his face a most lugubrious drag,) "that we are perfectly delighted at the opportunity of hearing any of your exquisite verses; but had you not better defer the reading for an hour or so, till the supper things are removed—till we have finished another bottle—till —."

"In fact," interrupted Mr. Quill, "our worthy host evidently labours under so severe a cold, attended with a considerable oppression upon his chest, that I should submit the propriety of his deferring altogether, till a more favourable opportunity, the intellectual treat which he has been so good as to propose."

"O, certainly, certainly," cried the rest of the party; "it would really be an imposition on our host's kindness—happy to take a glass of wine with you, Mr. Briggs—this salad's excellent—capital lobster—famous punch—any one seen the diorama?—did you go to see the new farce last night?"

"Very considerate of you," replied the poet; "I certainly have a little cold, and we will therefore defer the complete reading till another opportunity; but in the mean time you must allow me just to recite a few select specimens, that you may form some notion of my plan."

Objections, pleas, and rejoinders were urged in vain; the inexorable bard unfolded his scroll, and after two or three preliminary hems! proceeded to develop the system upon which it was composed.

"It was my original intention, gentlemen, to have written in blank verse; but I was alarmed by encountering the dictum of Dr. Johnson, limiting that mode of composition to such as think themselves capable of astonishing, while those who hope only to please must condescend to rhyme."

"There would have been no doubt of your astonishing," interrupted Mr. Jibe, "had you thought proper to adopt that metre: you are really too modest." Mr. Briggs bowed, and proceeded.

"I was moreover anxious to try upon a more enlarged scale than Pope, who, by the way, has egregiously failed, the principle of imitative harmony, of making the sound an echo to the sense, and of introducing a more general resemblance between the vocal sign and the thing signified, which I proposed to accomplish as much by changing the construction of the metre, as by the choice of expressive words. There can be no doubt that, in the origin of language, all terms bore some affinity to what they represented; there could have been no other mode or motive of selection in the infancy of the world than in that of individuals. And what do we observe in children? They invariably name animals from the noise which they make, calling a dog a bow-wow, a cat a mi-au, a cow a moo-cow, a lamb a baa-lamb, and a cock a cock-a-doodle doo. This is the primitive language of nature, like crying, laughing, and certain interjections, common to all nations. The cuckoo, pewet, and other birds, obviously receive their denomination from their cry; and what can be more happy than Ronsard's imitation of the song of the sky-lark:—

Elle quindée du zephire,
Sublime en l'air vit et revire,
Et y declaque un joly cri,
Qui rit, guérit, et ure l'ire
Des esprits emeux que je n'ecris."

"There are numerous words which as unquestionably have been chosen from their resemblance to the noise they designate, such as rumble, coo, yell, crash, crack, hiss, hoot, roar, murmur, simmer, and the like. It is true that ideas do not admit of an exact echo——"

"Which, however, is no loss to you," interrupted Mr. Jibe, "Oh, none whatever," resumed Briggs, not perceiving the sneer that was conveyed, "since, if we admit that

'Music resembles poetry; in each
Are nameless graces which no rules can teach,'

it may be sufficient to remind you that Handel contrived to express accurately upon the organ that sublime command—'God said, Let there be light, and there was light;' and composed one of the psalms with so happy a precision that every separate verse was distinctly recognisable. I see, however, that you are impatient for a specimen of my poem, and I will therefore recite a few lines from the introduction, the metre of which is intended to represent the bustle and animation of a siege.

Now Alaric's standards are proudly unfurled
Round the seven-hilled city, once queen of the world;
The siege is close pressed—round the ramparts are poured,
Gigantic and grim, a barbarian horde,
Who scowl on the grandeur of Rome with amazement,
And on palaces, castles, and fane as they gaze,
In her strength and her beauty they bid her not trust,
For her turreted head shall be dragged in the dust.
But the Romans confiding in bulwarks and gods,
Not an obolus caring for enemies odds,
Think the battering-ram a ridiculous dam,
An assault a mere hoax, and a capture a sham.
So they giggle and laugh, dance, revel, and quaff,
As, for sacrifice meant, does a garlanded calf."

"Fine! beautiful! exquisite!" ejaculated several voices at once.

"Do you observe the effect of the lively metre when I come to express the festivity of the besotted citizens? 'So they giggle and laugh, dance, revel, and quaff,'—does that strike you?"

"Oh, inimitable! and inimitable imitation!" exclaimed Mr. Jibe; "but I do not exactly see how a calf can be said to giggle, and laugh, and dance."

"But it bleats, Mr. Jibe; which under such circumstances, as it is a pleasurable sound, may be deemed equivalent to laughter."

"Very likely, very likely; you must know much better than I what a calf means, and what sort of sounds it makes."

"Then as to dancing," resumed the poet, "what says Pope?"
'The lamb that riot dooms to bleed to-day,
Had he thy reason, would he skip and play?'

Now, though I object to the word riot, since there is no such mighty excess in a leg of lamb with mint sauce, or a fore-quarter with asparagus, you see he makes the animal skip; and if a lamb may skip, surely a calf may dance."

"I sit corrected," cried Jibe, bowing with an air of burlesque conviction.

"In the following passage I have endeavoured to delineate the deep stillness and repose of the night that witnessed the assault.

Drowsy Tiber lagging laves
The city walls, its winking waves
Ose another scarcely pushing,
With low-breathing hushing gushing,
Till the whole stream with muffled head
Lies stretch'd asleep within its bed."

"The best place it could possibly have chosen," cried Jibe. "Zooks! sir, you must have written that passage under the direct inspiration of Morpheus, and ought to be crowned for it with a wreath of poppies. You were full of your subject when you set about it. It is a perfect soporific—an absolute opiate, so somnolent and lulling that—yaw-aw-aw!—excuse me, but I cannot pay you a greater compliment than by showing how completely I sympathise with its influence—yaw-aw-aw!"

Mr. Quill took up this note as soon as it was relinquished by Mr. Jibe; Mr. Snake succeeded; Mr. Ferret followed, and Mr. Briggs had recommenced half a dozen lines with the words—"dread omens," and been as often interrupted by an audible gasp, before he could proceed with his recitation.

"Dread omens, inauspiciously reveal'd, Announce her fate—the city's doom is seal'd."

"This is nothing," resumed the minstrel, "nothing whatever to my description of the clash of swords, the clank of armour, the rolling of the machines, the groans of the wounded, the cymbals and shouts of the victors. Talk of music—of the Siege of Belgrade, or Steibelt's Storm! I will give any man one of Tomkinson's grand pianos with three pedals, and will undertake to beat him by language alone, so stimulating the imagination through the ear, that the whole scene shall become as visible to the eye as if I had painted it upon a white wall. I do paint in fact, only dipping my tongue in picturesque words instead of my brush in representative colours—that's the whole secret! But you shall hear the effect of my explosion when Alaric sets fire to the train of gunpowder."

"Gunpowder!" ejaculated several voices at once; "surely that's an anachronism; have you not got the start of Friar Bacon some five hundred years or so? and will not the critics blow you up with your own combustibles?"

"I little thought," replied Briggs with a complacent smile, "that such a company, 'fit audience though few,' would have forgotten that Milton introduces artillery some thousands of years sooner."

"Egad," quoth Jibe, "so he does, and Alaric doubtless took the hint from the blind bard. You see, gentlemen, 'It is not Homer nods but we that dream.' Now for the explosion, but prithee have mercy upon our persons."

"Pray observe," resumed the poet, "the gradual rolling down of the thick walls, the écroulement, as the French call it—

"The ponderous walls that circum-rock—
(how do you like that compound epithet to express rocky solidity?)

The ponderous walls that circum-rock the town,
Slow crumbling, stumbling, tumbling, rumble jumble down."

Now mark the difference when a lofty tower falls with a sudden velocity and clatter.

Heaved by the writhing earth the towers creak, crack,
Then with a crash slap-dash, smash belter-skelter whack!

The tide of risibility which now "burst its continents," overwhelmed the astonished bard. In vain did he attempt to proceed; every effort was quashed by a quotation of his own last line, repeated in every possible variety of accent, gesture, and intonation; and when Jibe procured a momentary silence, he undertook the defence of his friend with an irony so solemn in appearance, and at the same time so ludicrous in intention and effect, that the merriment became more obstreperous than ever. As their host repeatedly emptied his glass in the heat of his poetical furor, some of his company as regularly refilled it, until he alternately hugged his defender with a maudlin fondness, and hurled defiance at the others with all the vociferation of an irritated and punch-inflamed poet. Jibe fostered his animosity by burlesquely arraigning the bad taste and delinquency of his assailants, and a scene ensued upon which we deem it prudent to drop the curtain, contenting ourselves with stating, in the concluding lines of a well-known song:

"Then a quarrel arose, some reflections were cast,
But for decency's sake we'll not mention what past,
Derry down, down, down, derry down." New Monthly Mag.

POETICAL PORTRAITS.

"Orient pearls at random strung."

SHAKESPEARE.
His was the wizard spell,
The spirit to enchain;
His grasp o'er nature fell,
Creation owned his reign.

MILTON.
His spirit was the home
Of aspirations high;
A temple, whose huge dome
Was hidden in the sky.

BYRON.
Black clouds his forehead bound,
And at his feet were flowers;
Mirth, madness, magic found
In him their keenest powers.

SCOTT.
He sings, and lo! romance
Starts from its mouldering urn,
While chivalry's bright lance
And nodding plumes return.

SPENSER.
Within the enchanted womb
Of his vast genius, lie [gloom]
Bright streams and groves, whose
Is lit by Una's eye.

WORDSWORTH.
He hung his harp upon
Philosophy's pure shrine;
And placed by nature's throne,
Composed each placid line.

WILSON.
His strain like holy hymn,
Upon the ear doth float,
Or voice of cherubim,
In mountain vale remote.

GRAY.
Soaring on pinions proud,
The lightnings of his eye
Scar the black thunder cloud,
He passes swiftly by.

BURNS.
He seized his country's lyre,
With ardent grasp and strong;
And made his soul of fire
Dissolve itself in song.

COLERIDGE.
Magician, whose dread spell,
Working in pale moonlight,
From superstition's cell
Invokes each satellite!

COWPER.
Religion's light is shed
Upon his soul's dark shrine;
And vice veils o'er her head
At his denouncing line.

YOUNG.
Involved in pall of gloom,
He haunts, with footsteps dread,
The murderer's midnight tomb,
And calls upon the dead.

GRAHAM.
O! when we hear the bell
Of 'Sabbath' chiming free,
It strikes us like a knell,
And makes us think of thee!

W. L. BOWLES.
From nature's flowery throne
His spirit took its flight,
And moves serenely on
In soft, sad, tender light.

SHELLEY.
A solitary rock
In a far distant sea,
Rent by the thunder's shock,
An emblem stands of thee!

BAILLIE.
The passions are thy slaves;
In varied guise they roll
Upon the stately waves
Of thy majestic soul.

CAROLINE BOWLES.
In garb of sable hue
Thy soul dwells all alone,
Where the sad drooping yew
Weeps o'er the funeral stone.

HEMANS.
To bid the big tear start,
Unchallenged, from its shrine,
And thrill the quivering heart
With pity's voice, are thine.

TIGHE.
On zephyr's amber wings,
Like thine own Psyche borne,
Thy buoyant spirit springs
To hail the bright-eyed morn.

LONDON.
Romance and high-souled love,
Like two commingling streams,
Glide through the flowery grove
Of thy enchanted dreams.

MOORE.
Crowned with perennial flowers,
By wit and genius wove,
He wanders through the bowers
Of fancy and of love.

SOUTHEY.
Where necromancy flings
O'er eastern lands her spell,
Sustained on fable's wings,
His spirit loves to dwell.

COLLINS.
Waked into mimic life,
The passions round him throng,
While the loud "Spartan life"
Thrills through his startling song.

CAMPBELL.
With all that nature's fire
Can lend to polished art,
He strikes his graceful lyre
To thrill or warm the heart.

THOMPSON.
The screams as they roll
Shall bear thy name along;
And graven on the soul
Of nature, live thy song.

MOIR.
On every gentler scene
That moves the human breast,
Pathetic and serene,
Thine eye delights to rest.

BARRY CORNWALL.
Soft is thy lay—a stream
Meandering calmly by,
Beneath the moon's pale beam
Of sweet Italia's sky.

CRABBE.
Wouldst thou his pictures know,
Their power, their harrowing truth,
Their scenes of wrath or woe?
Go gaze on hapless "Ruth,"

A. CUNNINGHAM.
Tradition's lyre he plays
With firm and skillful hand,
Singing the olden lays
Of his dear native land.

KEATS.
Fair thy young spirit's mould—
Thou from whose heart the streams
Of sweet Elysium rolled Over Endymion's dreams.

J. MONTGOMERY.
Upon thy touching strain
Religion's spirit fair,
Falls down like drops of rain,
And blends divinely there.

HOGG.
Clothed in the rainbow's beam,
Mid strath and pastoral glen,
He sees the fairies gleam,
Far from the haunts of men.

BLOOMFIELD.
Sweet bard, upon the tomb
In which thine ashes lie,
The simple wildflowers bloom
Before the ploughman's eye.

HOOD.
Impugn I dare not thee,
For I'm of puny brood;
And thou wouldst punish me
With pungent hardihood.

MAY DAY IN NEW-YORK.

During the last winter the law relative to the inspection of unslaked lime was brought before the common council, laid on the table, called up again, and again postponed, so often that we cannot tell who the inspectors are, nor the degrees of pulverization through which this May-day commodity must pass—legally, we mean. Laws, however, relating to such rebellious articles as lime and city dust, are set at defiance on and about the first day of May in each year. Already the periodical whirlwinds without, and the bleaching steam within, have announced to the uttermost dwellers in this goodly city, the advent of this day of general commotion. The spire of Trinity church, recently painted a Carnarvon slate colour, has already visibly changed its hue, and fairly turned pale, under the influence of the Rhode Island sirocco. The corporation tank, at the corner of the Bowery and Thirteenth-street, has not yet been supplied with its steam engine, so that the dust cannot be laid—the city-hall clock dares not show its illuminated faces—the figure of justice has tottered from the cupola—the criminal court has returned from the Rotunda to the protection of the white house—and divers other portents have announced the coming of this fearful day. Red and white lead are doing their best on the exteriors of our edifices; and the latter and lime are working their marvels on the wainscotings and walls of the interiors, while a Manhattan deluge is preparing for the windows and floors, from garret to cellar. Already the things called carts—the last invention, one would think the spirit of destruction could devise for the demolition of furniture—begin to groan under the motley burdens of beds, chairs, sofas, pots, kettles, cribs, and looking-glasses; and, flanked by servants, with chandeliers, pictures, plate, and other valuables, and followed by others, with the pet parrot, cat, canary, and dog, one or all, move in dire confusion through the broad and narrow ways of Gotham, like so many pedlers' caravans, or travelling menageries. "Soon as the evening shades prevail," the tramp of horses, the crashing of dumped furniture, and the anathemas of contending cartmen are hushed, and the belles of the city, disguised by cosmetics compounded of dust, cobwebs, and lime, are seen with their geraniums, roses, and other plants, fitting like startled ghosts from the old to the new family mansion. The long cherished flowers may not be trusted to any hands but those that have tended them. The careful housewife who has had the good fortune to obtain possession of a single room before the move-all hour of twelve to-day, might have been seen sitting in her armed chair in the centre of the room, directing the handbarrow men where to locate the chamber furniture, while with one jewel in the cradle and another on her knee, she listened for the signal by which the ins and outs rush from each other's presence.

Night will throw her sable and grateful curtain round many a dwelling that, looking to-day like a place for and of departed spirits, is destined to put on to-morrow the semblance of a human habitation, and will in the course of a week be joyous with social life. The tiny tack now vexes the maid, as the hammer glances from its head to her fingers—the glistening stair-boards slide suddenly into their eyelets—the portraits smile from their new elevations, the gold glitters from the chair backs, the wax lends its polish to the mahogany side-board, and the tenants take their first sitting repast in a lower room. Another day will roll round, and the papillottes will lose their tenacious hold of the filleted locks of matrons and daughters, the windows receiving a last ablution, will be garnished with the damask curtains, which in a short month must give place to a lighter fabric—the hall bell will announce the visit of neighbours, who by a time-honoured custom, if domiciliated before the new-comers, must pay the first visit, to be returned once by way of etiquette, and oftener, if fashion or friendship delight in the association. Such are some of the precedent and concomitant circumstances attending the annual bouleversement of many of even "the best regulated families." The luxury of the first night's rest after the toil and turmoil of a day like this is ineffable, and has a marvellous effect on the distempered doings of the previous day; the frontal corrugations disappear—the monosyllable, yes and no, pettishly and tartly uttered through the livelong day of bustle, are gradually exchanged for the bland accents of satisfaction and contentment; and after a little, the house being in order, and the parlour fires extinguished, every imagination glows with visions of rural felicity, and the map, the itinerary, and the newspaper are consulted for the selection of some pleasing summer retreat, or the shorter, but scarcely less agreeable steamboat excursion, for the benefit of fresh air, the killing of factitious cares, or the recovery of failing health. So mote it be.

Mercantile Advertiser.

LETITIA ELIZABETH LANDON.

Letitia Elizabeth Landon they say is writing a novel. By the by, I think you do not appreciate our English Sappho as she deserves; when do you mean to review her last poems? She is an extraordinary girl, unspoiled by the world's flatteries. I wish I could show her in person to you of Dublin, for an Irishman told me the other day, that you presumed to call her ugly! Ugly, indeed! the best possible sign you know nothing about her—voyons donc. Listen, lively lordings all. Letitia Elizabeth Landon is certainly under what is denominated the middle size; slight and exquisitely formed, with a hand and arm that Jove might swear by; a snowy skin, and on her cheek a faint colouring, a pinky tint, which, we grieve to say, tells almost too plainly of a delicate constitution; her brow is finely formed, her eyes quick and sparkling, her nose retrousee, her mouth and chin not well proportioned, but singularly flexible and expressive, her conversation is lively and sparkling, and as it applies to persons and things in general, unostentatiously shows an extraordinary knowledge of mankind, and an acquaintance with the world. She possesses three of the necessary requisites for a novelist in a superior degree—taste, tact, and talent; that quick talent which seizes on every thing likely to turn to advantage, or procure the end it has in view. She dances with grace and spirit, and is much attached to that amusement; from the liveliness she evinces in society you would never suppose her the author of the impassioned Improvisatrice. But it is not for her outward bearing, nor even the talent which ranks her with the first poets of the age that we admire ('tis a cold English word to express what we feel, but it must do) Letitia Elizabeth Landon; we admire and respect the lady for her private worth, for her excellent virtues, in every situation of life, for her total freedom from affectation, and for the kindness of her heart, "which is ever open as day to melting charity." Dublin Literary Gazette.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Education.—No subjects engage public attention more at the present time than the diffusion of knowledge, and the instruction of youth. You cannot open a review or magazine, but suggestions on education are certain to greet your eye. You cannot enter a public assembly and listen to a popular harangue, but the unvarying theme is education. Nay, the newspapers, which were formerly mere chronicles of the land and sea, now vie with each other in the attempt to exhaust the fund of common places on this one engrossing subject. To this no reasonable objection can be made, so long as those only discuss the intricate and delicate questions involved in the attempt to reform the methods of instruction, who are themselves qualified by preparatory knowledge and moral responsibilities.

"Let those teach others, who themselves excel."

But so great is the rage for disquisitions on the subject, and so ready a passport has it become to the favour of the multitude, that every puny whipster, who lets himself loose upon the world as a sorry engineer of a public press, attempts, by his eternal clamour about education, to draw off attention from his silly conceits and ignorance. Folly, inexperience, incompetency, and even vulgarity, are to be compensated for by a never-ceasing ding-dong about reform and change in our public and private schools. Ask these men what they understand by their watchword, and the chances are ten to one that they are unable to define the term. To develop, cultivate, and exercise the intellectual, moral, and physical faculties of our nature, to impart a clear and prompt perception of outward objects, a ready apprehension of the internal operations of the mind, to teach a correct unsophisticated logic, inspire a delicate and accurate taste for the beauties of nature and art, a high-toned and liberal moral feeling of right and wrong, and, not least, a mastery of expression in pure, perspicuous, and chaste language—these are some of the primary objects of an enlightened education. Shall those, then, who possess no knowledge of the structure either of mind or of body, and are alike ignorant of the objects to which their attention should be directed, be selected as teachers of youth, or what is still more important, as the directors of reform in existing systems? The very idea carries absurdity with it, and the toleration of the attempt evinces a certain deficiency of enlightenment or correct moral feeling in a community. But if these Jack-Cade revolutionists are ignorant of the philosophy of education, are they not equally so of its application to the useful and elegant arts, and even to the ordinary pursuits of life? Can they explain how the raw productions of nature are converted, with equal skill and beauty, into the manufactures of art, which grace the splendid warehouse, adorn the form of beauty, or decorate the mansions of the rich? Or how the almost miraculous combinations of simple mechanical powers into machinery increase the creative labour of the artisan and the operative classes? Or how the intercourse of nations the most remote has been rendered familiar and frequent, and the humanities of life, and the blessings of knowledge, and the sense of their inherent rights been diffused among mankind? Or how the mysterious operations of mind in the higher departments of learning and the fine arts have ministered to the delight, instruction, and elevation of the species by their beautiful and sublime creations? Are not all these avenues to knowledge and to the development of the higher faculties of mind so much undiscovered country to these noisy and factious quacks? And if so, is not their attempt to overturn existing institutions, however imperfect, so much folly and madcap hardness? All sudden innovations, for which the mind is not previously prepared by a graduated and skilfully conducted progress, must be dangerous in the moral, as in the civil and political world. And it is the aim and object of a benevolent and enlightened philosophy, and of a virtuous and truly radical reform, to prepare the mind for change, and when so prepared to effect it by means which shall be durable and not liable to revulsion. To entrust such preparation to uninformed and incompetent hands, would be attended with peril, such as would await a gallant ship's crew in a difficult passage through a strait beset with rocks and shoals under the guidance of an ignorant or a drunken pilot.

Female wages.—We have read, with undefinable satisfaction, the last circular issued by that indefatigable philanthropist, Matthew Carey, on the important subject of improving the condition of female labourers, and lightening the heavy burdens under which they at present groan. Every man not dead to the finest sensibilities of his nature, must heartily sympathize with the unmitigated and extreme sufferings to which the penuriosities of employers, and the indifference of the public, reduce this interesting portion of the useful operatives of our cities. The utter inadequacy of the pay which they receive to afford them a comfortable subsistence, even in cases where their industry has been stretched to the utmost bounds of human exertion, has now become matter of common notoriety. To no one are we more indebted for the exposition of this evil, than to Mr. Carey, and we have, on former occasions, expressed our warmest sympathies in behalf of his benevolent exertions. We should be pleased to evince our zeal still further by transferring his late interesting exposé to our columns, but we really have not the room. We shall cheerfully do all in our power to circulate a knowledge of the interesting facts it develops. We cannot here omit submitting a question to our fair countrywomen, whether it would not be more efficient and laudable charity, on their part, to aid Mr. Carey in his undertakings, than to bestow their money on the erection of monuments to commemorate events of which the memory can never die, or to send clothing and provisions to Siberia and China?

Steam-boats.—The disastrous incidents which have lately occurred on board of the principal boats have awakened much attention, and excited no small share of alarm to the dangers attending their navigation. A variety of circumstances have been suggested as the probable causes of these deplorable calamities, and remedies innumerable been proposed. A calm discussion of the subject is highly desirable by competent men of science, and their opinions should be received with great consideration and respect. Unprepared to enter on a minute investigation of details relating to the subject, we have, after some reflection, thought it might not be deemed impertinent to suggest a general means of securing the public against the frequent repetition of accidents by steam. This should consist in the appointment, by the legislature, of a supervisor or inspector of steam-boats, whose duty it should be to examine constantly at stated periods into the condition of their machinery, the character and competency of the engineers, and the general state of the boat and the crew. Persons well acquainted with the construction and principles of the steam engine are of course to be selected—and they should be made responsible for the faithful discharge of their important duties. Let them also be well remunerated for their services in such a manner as may be deemed most expedient.

The Harpers.—These generous caterers for the public instruction and amusement, are not inattentive to the encouragement of science and scientific men, as fully appears by the following highly flattering notice contained in the last number of the Medical Magazine, conducted by Dr. Peixotto, of this city.

"We are happy to find the indefatigable and enterprising Harpers turning their attention to medical publications. That New-York has not hitherto competed with Philadelphia in her encouragement of medical literature, has been chiefly owing to the want of a public spirited and enlightened publisher, who possessed means as well as inclination to remunerate authors and editors for their intellectual labours. Talent, learning, and industry are not deficient, and a liberal patronage will not fail to elicit their successful exertions."

National Academy of Design.—This useful institution has again thrown open its gallery for the inspection of the public. Unwilling to indulge in rash and hasty criticisms, we shall defer our remarks to a more convenient period. We would however, advise all lovers of the arts to visit the room, in order that they may exercise their own judgment respecting this beautiful exhibition.

Ourselves.—We are not in the habit of noticing the laudatory remarks with which our contemporaries occasionally honour our efforts to sustain the character, extend the usefulness, and enhance the interest of our miscellany. But in justice to our correspondents, we cannot omit informing them of the very complimentary manner in which their productions have been generally mentioned in almost every respectable paper in the Union, and more recently in some highly popular foreign journals. Among these the Glasgow Chronicle has been particularly indulgent and flattering in its tone. Such praise, and from such sources, will serve not to feed an idle vanity, but to inspire renewed ardour and zeal in exertions of improvement.

May day.—It was our intention to have concocted some passing remarks on this day of turbulence, noise, and confusion. But we have been anticipated by the able editor of the Mercantile, whose piquant article on the subject we have copied, as being far superior to any thing of our own, which we could offer in its stead.

Mr. Forrest.—This eminent tragedian has just concluded a very successful engagement at the Park. If we have not noticed his performances in detail, it has not arisen from any lessened admiration of his masterly delineations. But the characters in which he has appeared, have been often repeated. His personation of Metamora gains at every repetition with the public, and is loudly called for again and again. Crowds fill the house every night it is announced.

Mrs. Sharpe.—It is really astonishing to witness the unexampled improvement which this actress, ever a favourite with the public, has of late made in her performances. Characters in the higher walks of the drama, have been represented by her in the most impressive manner, and ensured her loud plaudits from the most select audiences. We do not often touch on dramatic criticisms, that department being so ably filled by our correspondent C.; and we are glad that his remarks last week gave such general satisfaction, as indeed they always do. We regret that circumstances prevented our witnessing Mrs. Sharpe's appearance in Lady Macbeth; but we shall notice her general merits in detail shortly.

Plate.—The next number of the Mirror will be accompanied with an engraving drawn by Davis, and most beautifully executed by Eddy of Boston, representing six additional public edifices of note in this city. This will be the last picture of buildings which we shall publish, for the present at least.

Boston Evening Bulletin.—The proprietors of this journal have deemed it inexpedient to continue its publication, and other papers inform us that the cause is want of patronage. We sincerely regret this circumstance, because the independence and manly tone of its editor, his well-known talents and superiority over the mass of the smaller fry which infest the fraternity, had gained for his labours merited approbation, and should have earned them a more liberal reward.

A good thought.—A Providence paper says, "A jeweller in this town, some days since, being engaged in his business, a sharp and fine piece of steel flew into the ball of his eye, and there lodged, subjecting him to the most acute pain. He made application to several medical men, none of whom, considering the delicate nature of the eye-ball, dared venture an operation, when another jeweller, fortunately thinking of the loadstone, placed it to the sufferer's eye, and instantly drew out the steel without the slightest injury."

THE MOON IS ON THE HILL.

ANDANTE CON MOLTO ESPRESSIONE.

A - wake, my light, my sleep - ing love, The moon is on the hill, With - out thy smile, where - e'er I rove; 'Tis cheer - less mid - night still; 'Tis mid - night still, a - round, a - bove, Cold, cheer - less mid - night still; A - wake, my light, my sleep - ing love, The moon is on the hill.

SECOND VERSE.

Wake, wake, and let the sun be bright,
And the young flowers fair for me,
Let the summer breeze be soft and light,
And all in harmony;
And the song of morning sung aright,
And all in harmony.
Awake my light, my sleeping love;
The moon is on the hill.

(From the London New Monthly Magazine for March.)

LETTER,

From Miss Amelia Jane Mortimer, London, to Sir Henry Clifford, Paris.

DEAR HARRY—You owe me a letter,
Nay, I really believe it is two;
But I make you still farther my debtor,
I send you this brief billet doux.
The shock was so great when we parted,
I can't overcome my regret;
At first I was quite broken hearted,
And have never recovered it yet!
I have scarcely been out to a party,
But have sent an excuse, or been ill;
I have played but three times at écarté,
And danced but a single quadrille;
And then I was sad, for my heart ne'er
One moment ceased thinking of thee;
I'd a handsome young man for my partner,
And a handsomer still vis-à-vis.
But I had such a pain in my forehead,
And felt so ennuied and so tired,
I must have looked perfectly horrid,
Yet they say I was really admired!
You'll smile—but mamma heard a lancer,
As he whispered his friend—and, said he,
"The best and most beautiful dancer
Is the lady in white"—meaning me!
I've been once to Lord Dorival's soirées,
Whose daughter in music excels;
Do they still wear the silk they call mairles?
They will know if you ask at Pardel's.
She begged me to join in a duet,
But the melody died on my tongue;
And I thought I should never get through it,
It was one we so often have sung.
In your last you desire me to mention
The news of the court and the town;
But there's nothing that's worth your attention,
Or deserving of my noting down.

They say things are bad in the city,
And pa thinks they'll only get worse;
And they say the new bonnets are pretty,
But I think them quite the reverse.
Lady Black has brought out her two daughters,
Good figures, but timid and shy;
Mrs. White's gone to Bath for the waters,
And the doctors declare she will die.
It's all off 'twixt Miss Brown and Sir Stephen,
He found they could never agree;
Her temper's so very uneven,
I always said how it would be.
The Miss Whites are grown very fine creatures,
Though they look rather large in a room;
Miss Grey is gone off in her features,
Miss Green is gone off—with her groom!
Lord Littleford's dead, and that noodle
His son has succeeded his sire;
And her ladyship's lost the fine poodle,
That you and I used to admire.
Little Joe is advancing in knowledge,
He begs me to send his regard;
And Charles goes on Monday to college,
But mamma thinks he studies too hard.
We are losing our man-cook, he marries
My French femme de chambre, Baptiste;
Pa wishes you'd send one from Paris,
But he must be a first-rate artiste.
I don't like my last new piano,
Its tones are so terribly sharpe;
I think I must give it to Anna,
And get pa to buy me a harp.
Little Gerald is growing quite mannish,
He was smoking just now a cigar!
And I'm fagging hard at the Spanish,
And Lucy has learnt the guitar.
I suppose you can talk like an artist,
Of statues, busts, paintings, virtù;
But pray, love, don't turn Bonapartist,
Pa will never consent if you do!

"You were born," he will say, "sir, a Briton,"
But forgive me so foolish a fear;
If I thought you could blame what I've written,
I would soon wash it out with a tear!

And pray, sir, how like you the ladies,
Since you've quitted the land of your birth?
I have heard the dark donnas of Cadiz
Are the loveliest women on earth.
The Italians are lively and witty,
But I ne'er could their manners endure;
Nor do I think French women pretty,
Though they have a most charming tournure!

I was told you were flirting at Calais,
And next were intriguing at Rome;
But I smiled at their impotent malice,
Yet I must say I wished you at home!
Though I kept what I fancied in petto,
And felt you would ever be true,
Yet I dreamed of the murd'rer's stiletto
Each night—and its victim was you!

I'm arrived at the end of my paper,
So, dearest, you'll not think it rude
If I ring for my seal and a taper,
And think it high time to conclude.
Adieu, then—dejected and lonely,
Till I see you I still shall remain,
Addio, mio caro—yours only—

Yours ever, AMELIA JANE.

P. S. You may buy me a dress like Selina's,
Her complexion's so much like my own;
And don't fail to call at Farina's
For a case of his Eau de Cologne.
And whate'er your next letter announces,
Let it also intelligence bring,
If the French have left off the deep founcs,
And what will be worn for the spring!

ST. PATRICK'S CATHEDRAL - MONTREAL

ST. MARK'S CHURCH - MONTREAL

ST. GEORGE'S CHURCH - MONTREAL

NEW-YORK MIRROR,

AND LADIES' LITERARY GAZETTE.

VOLUME VII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 16, 1880.

NUMBER 46.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

COLONEL BARTON AND GENERAL LAFAYETTE.

Colonel Barton, a hero of the American revolution, after having been immured in prison for debt, during the period of twenty years, in the state of Vermont, was released from his confinement on the fourth of July, 1826, by the Marquis Lafayette, who cancelled the claim against his old companion in arms, and thereby afforded him an opportunity of joining in the festivities of the American independence! Who after this will dare to assert that republics are ungrateful!—English paper.

Wake! for the morning's purple fold
Is drawn from the orient arch;
Wake—for the sun in his robes of gold
Comes forth on his monarch march;
Joy for the cannon's thunderings free
O'er the echoing mountain sent;
Joy for the drum's loud reveillé,
With the clarion's music blent—
Joy for the millions' stirring shout
On freedom's birth-morn bursting out!
But hush—a stern yet smothered groan
Steals forth upon the air,
Deep as the forest's solemn moan
When the midnight winds are there.
Whence comes that note? a painful jar
In freedom's swelling chime—
Why comes it too the mirth to mar
Of this all-joyous time,
When for earth's proudest jubilee
Have met the gallant and the free?
Look to yon rough and massy walls,
Where joy no music wakes—
Forth from its melancholy halls
That startling discord breaks;
Pierce to its lone discoloured hold,
With chill damps circled round;
There, like a felon, worn and old,
The patriot chief lies bound—
He of the lion-hearts, that broke
In their stern might, oppression's yoke!
Why groans he now, while every tongue
With gladness overflows,
Who erst defiance sternly flung
To freedom's island foes?
Why lies he there whose fettered foot
Leapt proud the fight to meet;
The foremost in the fierce pursuit,
Last in the lorn retreat?
Has guilt thus bowed that lofty brow?
List, for the warrior speaketh now:
"Tis sad that one whose blood has welled
Full oft on freedom's plain,
Should, on this hallowed morn, be held
By aught of bolt or chain!
Not that his crimes have reft from him
The right heaven gave at birth,
To tread with bold unshackled limb
Proudly his native earth;
But that he clasps not in his hold
The worship'd dust which men call gold!

—Stand from my grated bars away,
And let the cheering light
That beams on this immortal day
Steal in upon my sight;
Ah! hush the prison court beside,
That I may catch once more
My country's pean-burst of pride,
Trumpet and cannon's roar;
Like music on my heart it falls,
'Though heard within these frowning walls."
But who, with quick, yet lofty tread,
The captive's cell draws nigh?
'The light of glory on his head,
Of pity in his eye:
That port may well bescem a soul,
For angel actions nursed—
His name on fame's unfolding scroll
Shines radiant with the first;
'Tis Gaul's high chief, whose far felt worth
Links the wide severed realms of earth.

He speaks—the indignant champion,
Calmly and yet severe—
"Here's gold for that dishonoured one
Who holds the freeborn here:
Look on his aged breast—the scars
Of glorious fields ye'll find!
Back with the base degrading bars,
The circling chains unbind!
I've learnt to value freedom's worth—
Brother in arms and heart—come forth!"

PROTEUS.

THE LANCH.

Those who have ever witnessed the spectacle of the lanching of a ship of the line will, perhaps, forgive me for adding this to the examples of the sublime objects of artificial life.—Campbell's Essay.

The city's dooms were open'd. Forth there came
A mingled multitude, whose hearts were moved
As by a common impulse. There was seen
The man of many years, like him of old,
Resting upon his staff, while the glad ear
Caught the loud laugh of childhood, gushing out
From the deep fount of joy within the soul.
And there the young and beautiful of earth
Mingled with those who bore the three-fold seal
Of sickness, want, and sorrow, graven deep
Upon the furrow'd brow and pallid cheek.
All hasten'd onward till their course was stay'd
By the unfathom'd deep, whose broad expanse
Display'd no angry frown or whelming wave,
But smiles of peace and beauty.

There they stood,
While the spread wing of silence hover'd o'er
And hush'd all sounds of life. Why were they all
So motionless and mute? Had the hour come
In which the mighty deep should render up
Its hidden treasures? did they wait to clasp
Their friends beloved who slept beneath the wave?
Or had their spirits flown to scan the depths
Where diamonds gleam upon the hidden sands
In ocean's farthest caves? Or did they mark
The surface of the sea? its light and shade,
Its deep ethereal blue—its mirror broad?
Saw they the snowy sails, that to the eye
Hung midway in the sky, and seem'd the throne
Of bright celestial spirits? No! not this
The spell that bound the soul.

But 'twas that the proud ship
Broke the strong fetters that so long had held
Her form majestic in ignoble bonds—
At first she moved with slow and queenly grace,
As if her spirit saw with conscious pride
A presage of her greatness. Then she flew
As on the wind, and plung'd into the wave
That rose to bathe her form, and circling round
The eddies stretch'd away, as if to bear
The joyful tidings to the ocean's bound.

Then there broke
From the assembled host a deaf'ning shout
Of triumph and of joy. Nor this alone,
The mighty deep responded to the sound,
And join'd the wild halloo and loud acclaim,
With echo's magic voice.

Then on the mind
Rose the dim future, and the eye essay'd
To scan its hidden depths, to mark the path
Of the proud ship across the trackless deep,
Her nights of danger from the winds and waves,
And days of battle, when her country's foes
Should gather round. All this rose on the mind,
And when the words "Speed, speed thee! gallant ship!"
Burst from the lips, it seem'd a thing of life
Received the benediction.

CORA.

STANZAS.

Lean not on earth, 'twill pierce thee to the heart,
A broken reed at best, and oft a spear.—Young.

Love is heaven's attribute, therefore to heaven
Should its deep fervency be lifted up,
And not to earth or earthly things be given
The rich profusion of affection's cup;
Oh! not on things which perish should be poured
The wells of love with which the heart is stored.

Let the wide spirit of benevolence,
Young enterer upon life, pervade the heart;
And let affection, calm but not intense,
To all around its gentle worth impart;
But single not from earth's frail creatures one
Whom thy undoubting heart may rest upon.

Make not his voice thy music, nor his eye
Thy light of life—the thunder-peal of doom
Soon shall that music sound, that light shall be
The lightning-flash, which shall ere long consume
Thy heart's best feelings, till it doth become Blackened and scared—a tempest-shattered dome!

Alas! how often in an angel's guise
Comes to the bosom this insidious guest!
But when thou dost begin to note and prize
The looks and words of one above the rest
Of those around thee, when one footstep's sound
Thrills more than all the laughter ringing round,
One voice brings sweeter music to thine ear,
One glance a deeper gladness to thy heart;

One smile becomes the sunlight, which can cheer
Thy darkest hour, and bid all gloom depart;
And when the brightest scene seems dark and drear
And wearisome, unless that smile is near,
Then tremble—for thy heart hath now become
An idol's altar, and the hopes and joys,
And feelings fresh that made it once their home,
The youthful elasticity that buoys
The spirit up, all, one by one, shall be Sacrificed to thy wild idolatry.
And vain will be each offering! never yet
Did mortal bosom such excess requite—
And other forms will enter; grief, regret,
And disappointment, shutting out the light
Of hope and gladness from that dreary cell,
Thy heart, will every brighter guest expel.
This deep devotion, this undying trust,
They were not meant to rest on aught below;
To cling to frail and perishable dust:—
How blest were we, could we on heaven bestow
The love which now too oft but sorrow brings,
Unwisely lavished upon earthly things.

THYRA.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

THE ENGRAVING.

The picture which accompanies this impression of the Mirror presents a view of six more churches, five of which belong to the protestant, and one to the catholic persuasion. This plate completes the original design of furnishing the readers of this journal with correct delineations of the most conspicuous architectural features of our growing city; and the future subjects of our embellishments will consequently be more picturesque and various. Almost every public edifice in this emporium, which has any pretensions to celebrity for classical taste or architectural beauty, has already been exhibited to our readers, and every new one which may be hereafter erected of a similar character, shall be given in its turn: but for the present, this series of engravings must give place to others of a different description.

The plates intended for the eighth volume of the Mirror will comprise views of the scenery which characterizes the city and its vicinity. Among these the bay and harbour of New-York, with the numerous islands which adorn the delightful prospect, will not be forgotten. A sketch of this metropolis from the adjacent heights, will also be published, together with some of our most imposing street views, one of which is now in the hands of the artists.

In presenting to our readers the engraving which adorns the present number, we shall accompany it with a few remarks that are naturally suggested by one (and not the least attractive) of the subjects it embraces. We have said that it comprises a view of five churches appertaining to the protestant and one belonging to the catholic persuasion; as the institution of the latter in America is comparatively of recent date, we are induced by feelings of hospitality, as well as courtesy, to assign it the first place in our brief description of these several edifices. In this arrangement we are also incited by other considerations, which will appear in the course of the following observations.

Apart from all doctrinal and controversial speculations; (with which, as editors and current historians, we have nothing to do,) there are many interesting and classical associations connected with the term "Roman Catholic Church." From this ancient and venerable establishment, poetry and romance have drawn their richest materials, their most startling incidents, and their most enchanting scenes. The beautiful annals of chivalry owe half their fascination to the peculiarities of the religion which characterized the age in which it flourished.

The external pomp and splendour of the papal see, the gorgeous pageantry which attends many of its religious exhibitions, and the imposing effects of the rites and ceremonies of the catholic worship, in every part of christendom, have always imparted a degree of interest to the subject which has never been experienced in contemplating the rise and progress of any other denomination, whether religious or political.

The first settlers of this country, being zealous converts to the doctrines of the reformation, adopted severe and measures against the introduction of any other timents, especially such as favoured the church of Rome. In many parts of the country English episcopacy was looked upon with nearly equal abhorrence, if we may judge by a law of Connecticut, forbidding any one to keep Christmas, Easter, or any Saint's day, or to read the book of Common Prayer! But while the puritans of New-England were persecuting the Quakers and Episcopalians, the citizens of New-York were equally intolerant towards the Jews and Catholics. It was resolved, for instance, in the general assembly, that none of the Jewish profession could vote for representatives, or even be admitted as witnesses, "touching any contested election." Against the Roman Catholics they exercised this narrow spirit of intolerance to a still greater extent, and zealously recommended to the colonists to hold in religious abhorrence "the pope, the devil, and the pretender;" three personages whom our pious forefathers abjured as an infernal trio, the same in purpose, and equal in power and infamy. The following clause of a colonial statute will show the horror and detestation in which the members of this prescribed sect were then held:

"Every jesuit, emissary, priest, missionary, or other spiritual or ecclesiastical person, made or ordained by any authority, power, or jurisdiction, derived, challenged, or pretended, from the pope or see of Rome, or that shall profess himself, or otherwise appear to be such, by practising or teaching of others, to say any popish prayers, by celebrating of masses, granting of absolution, or using any other of the Romish ceremonies, or rites of worship, by what name, title, or degree soever such person shall be called or known, who shall continue, abide, or come into this province, or any part thereof, after the first day of November aforesaid, shall be deemed and accounted an incendiary, and disturber of the public peace and safety, and a disturber of the true christian religion, and shall be adjudged to suffer perpetual imprisonment! And if any person, being so sentenced and actually imprisoned, shall break prison and make his escape, and be afterwards retaken, he shall suffer such pains of death, penalties, and forfeitures as in cases of felony!"

During that alarming period of bigotry and intolerance, denominated the "Negro plot," in the summer of 1741, a Catholic emigrant, by the name of Ury, was convicted, on very equivocal testimony, of contravening the foregoing statute, and was actually executed on a public scaffold. It was many years afterwards that Catholics and Jews were finally admitted to the full participation of equal rights and privileges.

The first edifice erected in this city for public worship, according to the catholic forms, was St. Peter's church, built in the year 1786, at the corner of Barclay and Church streets. It is a plain but capacious brick structure, fronting in Barclay-street, with no external ornament except the gilt cross which surmounts the cupola. The rapid current of emigration from Ireland and other catholic countries, soon rendered another building necessary for the accommodation of this increasing sect; but the want of sufficient pecuniary means deferred the project until the year 1814, when an elegant edifice was founded, which is well known by the name of

ST. PATRICK'S CATHEDRAL.

This magnificent gothic superstructure is situated at the corner of Mott and Prince streets, fronting on the former. It is said to be the largest religious edifice in the city, being one hundred and twenty feet in length, by eighty feet in width. It is constructed of stone, in a massive style, the walls being several feet in thickness, and seventy feet in height; from the summit of which the roof rises, in a sharp angle, to the height of one hundred feet. This aspiring roof, in connection with two quadrangular towers on the front corners, and a central steeple, forms the most conspicuous object in approaching the city from the east.

The front of the building is faced with hewn brown stone, and several niches are left open for statues, which are to be placed when the whole is finished, when it will undoubtedly be the most impressive-looking edifice in the city. It is furnished with a fine-toned organ and a select choir, whose performances are generally and justly admired. The Rev. John Power is the officiating pastor.

The interior of the cathedral, which is finished and painted in a superior manner, is capable of holding five thousand people, although it has no side galleries. The whole cost of the building, when fully completed, will not fall short of one hundred thousand dollars. No church in the United States (the cathedral in Baltimore excepted) will then compare with it in capacity or to that indeed, the gothic order seems to be the fittest when the church was in the zenith of its power and magnificence, by ecclesiastical personages, expressly for religious purposes. It is generally admitted by persons of taste among all denominations, that this style of architecture has a powerful tendency to augment the solemnity of divine worship, and excite the attention, awe, and devotion of those who assist at it. Where is the mortal so stupid, so dissipated, or so totally devoid of all religious impressions, as not to experience something of pious solemnity, not to say reverence, among the long-drawn aisles, the aspiring arches, the lofty pinnacles, and ramified tracery of an ancient cathedral? Where is the being, who has any pretensions to taste and sentiment, who will say that the boasted paragon of modern art and magnificence, St. Paul's cathedral, is so well calculated to dispose his mind to solemnity and religious contemplation, as the cathedrals of York, Lincoln, and Winchester?

CHRIST'S CHURCH, ANTHONY-STREET.

This imposing structure, which was erected in the year 1823, on the former site of a theatrical edifice, in Anthony-street, is ninety-six feet in length and sixty-five in breadth. The sides and rear are constructed of neat gray stone; but the whole front, together with the quadrangular tower, is faced with brown hewn stone. The doors and windows are niched and arched in the true pointed gothic style. The tower, before mentioned, projects three feet from the face of the front wall, and is ninety feet in height, surmounted with an open battlement and quadrangular pyramids. In the rear of the church is the vestry-room, which is twenty-eight feet in length by eighteen in breadth. From this apartment a flight of steps leads to the pulpit. The interior of the main building is finished in a plain gothic style, and contains one hundred and twenty-four pews on the ground floor, and sixty-six in the galleries. There is a gradual declivity to the chancel, in front of the pulpit, and a neat railing excluding the reading desk. The pulpit, canopy, and altar are finished in a style bordering on the florid gothic, of most exquisite workmanship, and very appropriate taste. The Rev. Dr. Lyell is the rector, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Thomas Clarke.

ST. MARE'S CHURCH, STUYVESANT-STREET.

This building, which was erected in the year 1796, is constructed of dark stone, and is one hundred feet in length by sixty-four in breadth. It was originally finished with a quadrangular tower rising from the roof, and terminating at the belfry, without a spire. But in the year 1827, Martin E. Thompson, Esq. our well-known architect, suggested the idea of raising a spire of brick-work, from the summit of the tower, to an elevation of eighty-four feet. This idea was approved and adopted; and the spire erected under the direction of Mr. Thompson, being the first of the kind ever attempted in this country. It adds much to the beauty of the edifice, and reflects great credit on the taste and enterprise of the architect. The Rev. William Creighton is the officiating clergyman.

GRACE CHURCH.

Grace church, which is situated in Broadway, corner of Rector-street, occupies the site of a former Lutheran church, erected in the year 1671, and destroyed by fire in 1776, on the day after the British army took possession of the city. Trinity church, and most of the lower part of the city, was laid in ashes by the same unfortunate conflagration. Grace church was erected in 1809, as an independent church. It is a neat substantial edifice of brick, with a handsome cupola. The rear of the building is of an elliptical form, with a terraced garden, and the rector's house adjoining. The interior of the church is elegant, and has four massive pillars at each front angle of the gallery, running up to and supporting an arched and pannelled ceiling. The pulpit is in front of the ellipsis, with a raised mahogany enclosure, surrounding the altar. In the gallery, fronting the pulpit, is a large and elegant organ, made by Mr. Geib, of this city, which is said to be of excellent tone. The Rev. Dr. Jonathan M. Wainwright occupies the clerical desk.

ST. GEORGE'S CHAPEL.

This building, which is situated in Beekman-street, was first erected in the year 1752, and, with the exception of Trinity, is the oldest Episcopal church in this city. It is constructed of brown hewn stone, and is one hundred and four feet in length by seventy-two in width. In 1811, it separated from Trinity by mutual agreement, and became a distinct parish. In 1814, in the night of the 5th of January, it caught fire from the conflagration of a workshop in its rear, and every thing combustible about it was consumed to ashes; the interior, roof, clock, steeple, and all. Nothing but the bare walls remained. With the prompt and efficient aid of Trinity church, it was again rebuilt, and consecrated in November, 1815. It is a plain edifice, and has now a quadrangular tower, with a railing on the top, but no spire. It has a headless spectre had several times been seen by different young men of the village, and more than once by the aged inhabitants, whose veracity could not be doubted. These reports, so well authenticated, together with the loneliness and dreariness of that part of the forest, impressed the stoutest hearts of all the clan (towns-people of Long Island are very clanish) with such feelings of terror, that, whenever they had to pass the place after night-fall, they would slouch their hats over their eyes and urge their horses to full speed, that they might not encounter the dreadful phantom, who usually took his stand near the road side with his withered arms extended, and his headless trunk exposed to view. It must not be supposed that his spectreship was visible to common eyes every night in the year—far from it—it was never known to appear unless the sky was perfectly cloudless, and the moon (being in its first quarter) had gained a certain position in the western horizon; therefore, it may easily be imagined that very few of those who dreaded, had had the honour of beholding, the sad visitant, who had for forty long years presented himself, in the vain hope, as it was supposed, that some generous being would overcome his fears so far as to draw near and make the usual demand in those cases—"What seekest thou, fair ghost?"

John Hageman, as I observed before, was one of the bravest, as well as one of the gayest of all the youths of the village; and as fond of listening to a good story on a Sunday evening as any one, but not being possessed of the credulous organ, he would not believe one jot or tittle of the tale of the terrible apparition of the wood.

"You may swear," said he one day to old Joe Haywood, who was a way-faring man, and forlorn, and used as often to seek his bed at the hedge-side upon the moss-covered sod, as ask from the human family a cold-granted shelter from the dews of the night. "You may swear till you are black in the face, Joe," said he; "I'll not give credence to your tale until I see the thing with my own eyes, and not then if I've been drinking, which you do so often, that you see double, and then it is no wonder that you should conjure up a thousand things equally strange and fanciful, and I fear that you will die some day of a drunken fit."

"Good, now, friend John; that puts me in mind of the epitaph I have been making."

"Epitaph! for whom, Joe?"

"For myself, to be sure—who else would do me that kindness, think you? Why not a creature, from the king to the beggar, who have shaken hands with 'honest old Joe' in the day when his eyes stood out with fatness, and his cheeks were rosy with the juice of Newtown pippins. No, no, master John, not a stone, nor a bush will mark the spot where the idler is laid. Therefore have I written mine own epitaph—a mere impromptu, but nevertheless true.

"Here lies one! Who do you think?
'Tis old Joe Haywood—give him some drink.
Drink for a dead man! The reason why?
When living, he was always dry."

"Go, get you to the cellar, Joe, with a flagon. Now, what a good Falstaff that fellow would make, if he were a degree more drunken, or less brave?" and John Hageman mounted his gray pony and cantered off to pay his accustomed visit to the girl of his heart, it being Sunday evening.

When he reached the haunted spot in the wood—"The moon is in its first quarter," thought John, "and the night promises fair. Now I am determined upon knowing two things this night before I sleep. Firstly, whether Mary, the idol of my fancy, will marry me, or no—and, secondly, who the spirit can be that plays his gambols hereabouts. I'll find him out, or he is a cleverer ghost than I take him to be; and Mary must make up her mind before the moon goes down. On its curved horn one might hang a halter, forsooth—a fair promise for a hay making season." And John was soon seated by the side of Mary, where we left him a few periods since, listening in breathless silence for her final response to his startling proposal.

"You must indeed, Mary," he said, in a voice scarcely audible.

The maiden gazed in earnest attention at the splendid crescent as its pearly light gave a less distinct view of objects around the nearer it approached the western horizon.

"I can wait no longer," cried John, and he pressed the hand of Mary as if it were for the last time.

"I am thine, John Hageman," uttered the maid in her own sweet tone, and she hid her beautiful face in the bosom of her lover, who imprinted a kiss upon her fair temple.

"Adieu, my own Mary," he said; "one week more, and I will not have to pronounce that hated word which now separates us for a season." And John had reached the wood ere the sound of his adieu had ceased to vibrate on the ear of Mary.

A few moments more brought him to the haunted spot, but the beloved object of his heart had so completely occupied his mind that, notwithstanding his resolves respecting the discovery of the apparition, he would have passed the hollow without giving a thought to it; but it was not so ordained, for so suddenly did the gray pony stop, that if John had not been the best horseman in the world he must have been thrown to the earth. He cast a look forward to find what had so alarmed the animal, which was trembling with dread and terror.

"By my faith, yonder it is, sure enough!" cried John, and with a feeling quite new to himself, he slowly dismounted and cautiously approached the object of his astonishment—the headless phantom! For a minute he stood before it and contemplated its figure with a full and careful survey, during which his imagination was wrought up to the highest pitch.

"Speak, I pray you, speak, unhappy shade!" he exclaimed. "Why haunt you thus this solitary nook? Have you ought to reveal? If so, say it, I entreat of you, and depart in peace to the lone and dark recess to which those murderous hearts condemned you."

Here he paused for a reply, but heard no sound except the heavy breathing of the affrighted pony, and the "wood-pecker tapping the hollow beech tree."

"There can be no harm in touching it," thought he; and he extended his hand and grasped—instead of the withered arm—the dry branch of a small decayed oak! John immediately recovered his presence of mind.

"There, I told Joe it was all a cheat; the light of the moon shining obliquely on this insignificant stump, has effected the singular deception that went well nigh to shake my fortitude."

Hageman mounted his pony and rode gaily home, to forget the "spectre of the wood," and dream of his Mary. P. J.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

THE lovers of music were gratified by a rich treat on Monday evening. A good deal of excitement prevailed, occasioned by Mrs. Austin and Signorina Da Ponte coming in contact on the same evening, for the first time. It was certainly a bold step on the part of the latter; and though it would be unfair to institute a minute comparison between a comparatively unpractised singer and one of established celebrity, we can safely and with pleasure say, that Signorina Da Ponte acquitted herself in a manner calculated to sustain the opinion entertained of her powers by her more moderate admirers. The way in which this young lady was brought before the public was, to say the least of it, extremely injudicious. Extraordinary expectations were raised, which only extraordinary powers could satisfy; and such powers, either natural or acquired, we believe it will now be pretty generally allowed by musical men, Signorina Da Ponte does not possess. This is, of course, saying nothing in her disparage, for not one in a million is gifted with all the requisites necessary to constitute a first-rate singer: even Pasta and Malibran—women with whom it would be folly for a moment to compare Miss Da Ponte—have deficiencies. In the literary world it has become a settled rule, that every new novelist, possessing a sprinkling of talent, should receive his praise in the form of being set down as inferior only to the author of Waverley; and in this city it has also become a settled rule, that every fresh vocalist is the legitimate successor to "the Signorina." This is certainly a short critical cut, and saves a vast deal of trouble, as it requires neither judgment nor discrimination to simply make the assertion; but unfortunately there have been so many "legitimate successors," that this convenient phrase is getting into bad repute. We ourselves recollect some half dozen who have, according to the papers, filled this vacancy, to wit, Mrs. Knight, Mrs. Austin, Miss George, Madame Feron, Miss Phillips, and Signorina Da Ponte. But it is only with the claims of the latter that we have at present to do. Her voice by some is thought to be a mezza soprano, by others a soprano. It certainly possesses considerable compass, but it is by no means equal or of the first quality. It is what is technically termed a "head voice;" that is, the upper notes are formed in the upper part of the throat instead of coming full from the chest. The lower notes are formed in the chest, and have considerable power, but some huskiness; the middle ones are inferior in mellow richness to those of Miss George; the upper ones superior to that lady's, which become thin as she ascends the scale. But again, Signorina Da Ponte's upper notes are inferior in clearness and distinctness to those of Mrs. Knight, and in force and flexibility to those of Madame Fe-

ron. Her style is good. She has evidently been well taught, and has profited by her instructions, though she as yet sings rather with the diffidence of a pupil than the confident reliance on her own powers of an accomplished professor. The deficiencies of her voice may for ever prevent her rising to the top of her profession; but by close study, and above all, frequent practice, she may attain a high degree of excellence. To do that, however, she must not be flattered into quiet satisfaction and self-complacency with what she has already acquired, but by honest candour made sensible that she has yet much to learn. Those who pursue the latter course will eventually be found to be this interesting young lady's true friends.

We have frequently expressed our opinion of Mrs. Austin, but a few observations on the quality of her voice, and a peculiarity in her manner, may not be out of place. Nature has gifted this lady with a voice that, with the exception of Madame Malibran's, has, in many respects, never been equalled in this country. It reminds us more of that of Miss Stephens than of any other European vocalist. It is of great compass, including usefully two octaves and a half, and may possibly reach three octaves, though not with the ease necessary to render all the notes effective; but it is not so much for this that we admire it, as for its remarkable purity and sweetness. The most acute and practised ear would probably find a difficulty in detecting a particle of harshness in its whole range, and its liquid tones come as softly upon the sense of hearing as snow upon the water, or dew upon the flower. In the words of the poet, they

"fall as sweet
On the listening ear,
As the odours on the sense,
When the summer's close is near."

These tones have the true "dying fall," and for them to make "most sweet music" in the utterance, is just as natural as for the rose or woodbine to fling its fragrance on the summer wind—neither can help it. We do not believe more delicate sounds can be borne upon the air, than are breathed forth in some of her cadences, those she executes for instance, in the song of "Oh father, since that fatal day." The flexibility of her voice is equal but different from that of Madame Feron's. The one is a rapid and quivering succession of sounds, while the tones of the other fade away, and melt and blend together like the lights and shadows of an harmonious picture.

Mrs. Austin, favourite as she is, has not had justice done her on one point—the peculiarity we before alluded to. She relies too much upon the goodness of her voice, and lacks judgment, or rather dramatic tact, in the management of it; and this is the reason why she does not oftener produce what is termed a "sensation," but remains content with being uniformly delightful.

To those who have paid much attention to theatrical singing, the meaning of this will be very obvious. As Puff observes in the Critic, there is a great deal in hinting to the audience when to applaud, and herein Mrs. Austin is deficient. We have heard singers go through a song miserably, but towards the conclusion gather their whole strength for what is termed a coup de force—they approach the foot-lamps with evident marks of preparation about them, look the audience in the face, as much as to say "I am going to do something wonderful!" they then do it, and afterwards look at them again as much as to say "I have done it—why don't you applaud?" and ten to one but they do get applauded to their heart's content. Now we have seen Mrs. Austin execute the most difficult passages, but with so much ease and facility, that the audience looked upon it as a matter of course, and thought there was nothing particular going on: they fell into the very common but erroneous belief, that in singing, what is done easily can be easily done. We know it is the perfection of art to conceal art, and so far Mrs. Austin is right; and in a room filled with consummate judges this would be quite proper, but it is bad policy before a miscellaneous audience, who never sufficiently appreciate delicate and unobtrusive beauties. We have even seen singers with rather harsh voices gain credit for much sweetness, merely by managing skilfully to contrast a few soft tones with the surrounding harsh ones; they went upon the principle that "every thing is by comparison," and succeeded, while voices of far more natural and uniform sweetness passed unnoticed. So true it is, that in this world of ours, putting what is called "a good face upon the matter," is half the battle, and real merit often fails, while empty but bold pretension is triumphant. As long as things are as they are, a little of this stage-effect in singing is not only admissible, but necessary, and we advise both Mrs. Austin and Signorina Da Ponte to pay some attention thereto.

GENEROUSITY.—To be truly generous, is never to make a boast of the actions you have done.

timents, especially such as favoured the church of Rome. In many parts of the country English episcopacy was looked upon with nearly equal abhorrence, if we may judge by a law of Connecticut, forbidding any one to keep Christmas, Easter, or any Saint's day, or to read the book of Common Prayer! But while the puritans of New-England were persecuting the Quakers and Episcopalians, the citizens of New-York were equally intolerant towards the Jews and Catholics. It was resolved, for instance, in the general assembly, that none of the Jewish profession could vote for representatives, or even be admitted as witnesses, "touching any contested election." Against the Roman Catholics they exercised this narrow spirit of intolerance to a still greater extent, and zealously recommended to the colonists to hold in religious abhorrence "the pope, the devil, and the pretender;" three personages whom our pious forefathers abjured as an infernal trio, the same in purpose, and equal in power and infamy. The following clause of a colonial statute will show the horror and detestation in which the members of this prescribed sect were then held:

"Every jesuit, emissary, priest, missionary, or other spiritual or ecclesiastical person, made or ordained by any authority, power, or jurisdiction, derived, challenged, or pretended, from the pope or see of Rome, or that shall profess himself, or otherwise appear to be such, by practising or teaching of others, to say any popish prayers, by celebrating of masses, granting of absolution, or using any other of the Romish ceremonies, or rites of worship, by what name, title, or degree soever such person shall be called or known, who shall continue, abide, or come into this province, or any part thereof, after the first day of November aforesaid, shall be deemed and accounted an incendiary, and disturber of the public peace and safety, and a disturber of the true christian religion, and shall be adjudged to suffer perpetual imprisonment! And if any person, being so sentenced and actually imprisoned, shall break prison and make his escape, and be afterwards retaken, he shall suffer such pains of death, penalties, and forfeitures as in cases of felony!"

During that alarming period of bigotry and intolerance, denominated the "Negro plot," in the summer of 1741, a Catholic emigrant, by the name of Ury, was convicted, on very equivocal testimony, of contravening the foregoing statute, and was actually executed on a public scaffold. It was many years afterwards that Catholics and Jews were finally admitted to the full participation of equal rights and privileges.

The first edifice erected in this city for public worship, according to the catholic forms, was St. Peter's church, built in the year 1786, at the corner of Barclay and Church streets. It is a plain but capacious brick structure, fronting in Barclay-street, with no external ornament except the gilt cross which surmounts the cupola. The rapid current of emigration from Ireland and other catholic countries, soon rendered another building necessary for the accommodation of this increasing sect; but the want of sufficient pecuniary means deferred the project until the year 1814, when an elegant edifice was founded, which is well known by the name of

ST. PATRICK'S CATHEDRAL.

This magnificent gothic superstructure is situated at the corner of Mott and Prince streets, fronting on the former. It is said to be the largest religious edifice in the city, being one hundred and twenty feet in length, by eighty feet in width. It is constructed of stone, in a massive style, the walls being several feet in thickness, and seventy feet in height; from the summit of which the roof rises, in a sharp angle, to the height of one hundred feet. This aspiring roof, in connection with two quadrangular towers on the front corners, and a central steeple, forms the most conspicuous object in approaching the city from the east.

The front of the building is faced with hewn brown stone, and several niches are left open for statues, which are to be placed when the whole is finished, when it will undoubtedly be the most impressive-looking edifice in the city. It is furnished with a fine-toned organ and a select choir, whose performances are generally and justly admired. The Rev. John Power is the officiating pastor.

The interior of the cathedral, which is finished and painted in a superior manner, is capable of holding five thousand people, although it has no side galleries. The whole cost of the building, when fully completed, will not fall short of one hundred thousand dollars. No church in the United States (the cathedral in Baltimore excepted) will then compare with it in capacity or elegance. In point of style we think it superior to that of Baltimore; indeed, the gothic order seems to be the fittest for religious edifices; and it was invented and perfected when the Catholic church was in the zenith of its power and magnificence, by ecclesiastical personages, expressly for religious purposes. It is generally admitted by persons of taste among all denominations, that this style of architecture has a powerful tendency to augment the solemnity of divine worship, and excite the attention, awe, and devotion of those who assist at it. Where is the mortal so stupid, so dissipated, or so totally devoid of all religious impressions, as not to experience something of pious solemnity, not to say reverence, among the long-drawn aisles, the aspiring arches, the lofty pinnacles, and ramified tracery of an ancient cathedral? Where is the being, who has any pretensions to taste and sentiment, who will say that the boasted paragon of modern art and magnificence, St. Paul's cathedral, is so well calculated to dispose his mind to solemnity and religious contemplation, as the cathedrals of York, Lincoln, and Winchester?

CHRIST'S CHURCH, ANTHONY-STREET.

This imposing structure, which was erected in the year 1823, on the former site of a theatrical edifice, in Anthony-street, is ninety-six feet in length and sixty-five in breadth. The sides and rear are constructed of neat gray stone; but the whole front, together with the quadrangular tower, is faced with brown hewn stone. The doors and windows are niched and arched in the true pointed gothic style. The tower, before mentioned, projects three feet from the face of the front wall, and is ninety feet in height, surmounted with an open battlement and quadrangular pyramids. In the rear of the church is the vestry-room, which is twenty-eight feet in length by eighteen in breadth. From this apartment a flight of steps leads to the pulpit. The interior of the main building is finished in a plain gothic style, and contains one hundred and twenty-four pews on the ground floor, and sixty-six in the galleries. There is a gradual declivity to the chancel, in front of the pulpit, and a neat railing excluding the reading desk. The pulpit, canopy, and altar are finished in a style bordering on the florid gothic, of most exquisite workmanship, and very appropriate taste. The Rev. Dr. Lyell is the rector, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Thomas Clarke.

ST. MARK'S CHURCH, STUYVESANT-STREET.

This building, which was erected in the year 1796, is constructed of dark stone, and is one hundred feet in length by sixty-four in breadth. It was originally finished with a quadrangular tower rising from the roof, and terminating at the belfry, without a spire. But in the year 1827, Martin E. Thompson, Esq. our well-known architect, suggested the idea of raising a spire of brick-work, from the summit of the tower, to an elevation of eighty-four feet. This idea was approved and adopted; and the spire erected under the direction of Mr. Thompson, being the first of the kind ever attempted in this country. It adds much to the beauty of the edifice, and reflects great credit on the taste and enterprise of the architect. The Rev. William Creighton is the officiating clergyman.

GRACE CHURCH.

Grace church, which is situated in Broadway, corner of Rector-street, occupies the site of a former Lutheran church, erected in the year 1671, and destroyed by fire in 1776, on the day after the British army took possession of the city. Trinity church, and most of the lower part of the city, was laid in ashes by the same unfortunate conflagration. Grace church was erected in 1809, as an independent church. It is a neat substantial edifice of brick, with a handsome cupola. The rear of the building is of an elliptical form, with a terraced garden, and the rector's house adjoining. The interior of the church is elegant, and has four massive pillars at each front angle of the gallery, running up to and supporting an arched and pannelled ceiling. The pulpit is in front of the ellipsis, with a raised mahogany enclosure, surrounding the altar. In the gallery, fronting the pulpit, is a large and elegant organ, made by Mr. Geib, of this city, which is said to be of excellent tone. The Rev. Dr. Jonathan M. Wainwright occupies the clerical desk.

ST. GEORGE'S CHAPEL.

This building, which is situated in Beekman-street, was first erected in the year 1752, and, with the exception of Trinity, is the oldest Episcopal church in this city. It is constructed of brown hewn stone, and is one hundred and four feet in length by seventy-two in width. In 1811, it separated from Trinity by mutual agreement, and became a distinct parish. In 1814, in the night of the 5th of January, it caught fire from the conflagration of a workshop in its rear, and every thing combustible about it was consumed to ashes; the interior, roof, clock, steeple, and all. Nothing but the bare walls remained. With the prompt and efficient aid of Trinity church, it was again rebuilt, and consecrated in November, 1815. It is a plain edifice, and has now a quadrangular tower, with a railing on the top, but no spire. It has a clock in the tower, which is considered an excellent time-piece, and a fine-toned organ in the front gallery. The rector is the Rev. James Milnor, who is now absent, having gone to London, as a delegate from the American Bible society, and will probably return in September. In the meantime his place is supplied by the Rev. Mr. Henderson.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

This is a neat stone edifice, situated in Cedar-street, between Nassau and William streets; is eighty-one feet in length, and sixty-six in breadth, with a quadrangular tower rising from the roof, and surmounted with a handsome cupola. The sessions-room is in the rear, and the interior is commodious and tastefully finished. This edifice was erected in 1807, and was several years under the pastoral charge of the late Rev. Dr. Romeyn. The present pastor is the Rev. Cyrus Mason.

ORIGINAL TALES.

THE SPECTRE OF THE WOOD.

A COURTSHIP OF FIFTY YEARS AGO.

"You must decide before the moon goes down, Mary," said John Hageman to his lady-love, as he sat by her side in the hall door of her father's mansion, of which she was the sole inheritor. "You must positively decide before yon moon goes down!" said John, emphatically; and the maiden raised her lovely countenance towards that luminary which a single sentence had coupled with her destiny.

It was at the close of a summer evening—at the time when the air is fragrant with the perfume of early flowers, and the opening buds of the apple and the grape, and when the earth is fully crowned and smiling with new verdure. The moon was scarcely more than a crescent, but even thus it was at moments so transcendently beautiful, that a pope might have bent his knee in admiration before it, and deemed it no crime. Unsullied by cloud or vapour, it was descending gradually towards the bed of the ocean, that lay extended far in the distance like a dark shining mirror. Not a wave was curling amid that vast expanse of waters, for the wind seemed to sleep, and only murmured in its slumber as an infant in its happiest dream. The landscape around was in perfect harmony with the quiet of the ocean and the beauty of the heavens. A sloping lawn, and field, and meadow, in front of the mansion, extended to the white sand-banks that girded the sea. On one side a wood, deep and sombre, arose—on the other were airy hills, covered with cattle and the bleating herd. And this enchanting domain must one day, sooner or later, descend to Mary; but John's eye had not looked to that circumstance alone when he dedicated his heart's devotedness to the maiden, for she was herself the fairest lily of that beautiful valley. So all readily confessed, and many a rival swain sighed for the possession of such an union of wealth and loveliness.

Mary's features were of the Grecian cast, to which a profusion of bright chestnut curls and a pair of fine eyes, gave a most perfect expression. Her form was of symmetrical beauty, but the simple girl was not sensible of this advantage; she had never been told so, and therefore had cultivated no grace of art to heighten her pretensions. Modesty is innate in the female breast—this, in its purest light, shed a lustre over all her actions. She had long been loved, and ardently pursued by John Hageman, the bravest and blithest of all the swains; but he had received no definite answer—he could boast of nothing beyond a smile or a tear; yet, from those harbingers of feeling, had the youth drawn the favourable conclusion that his affections were fully requited. He resided in a village of Long Island, not far distant from the habitation of Mary, as did many other of the youths whose tender minds also cherished with enthusiastic affection the one loved name.

John Hageman had every advantage of face and person, yet he knew less of it than any other man—for a toilette or mirror were things almost unknown to him; therefore he had very rarely contemplated those features which every female in his vicinity could with more certainty attest to than he himself. As I have said before, there was a deep and sombre wood adjoining the beautiful valley, and those persons who came from the village, two miles distant, were obliged to pass that way. About midway of this compact forest of trees is a dell, or hole, of small circumference, but very deep. This, by the good people of the country, was usually called Buttermilk-hollow. There was a legend attached to this spot; the story ran thus: During the old French war an unfortunate prisoner fell into the hands of some semi-barbarians, who, without a feeling of remorse, decapitated the wretched man, and left him in the wood to tell his own story as he might to tardy passengers who were obliged to pass that way at a late hour, and to such as were lovers of beauty and the moon. The headless spectre had several times been seen by different young men of the village, and more than once by the aged inhabitants, whose veracity could not be doubted. These reports, so well authenticated, together with the loneliness and dreariness of that part of the forest, impressed the stoutest hearts of all the clan (towns-people of Long Island are very clanish) with such feelings of terror, that, whenever they had to pass the place after night-fall, they would slouch their hats over their eyes and urge their horses to full speed, that they might not encounter the dreadful phantom, who usually took his stand near the road side with his withered arms extended, and his headless trunk exposed to view. It must not be supposed that his spectreship was visible to common eyes every night in the year—far from it—it was never known to appear unless the sky was perfectly cloudless, and the moon (being in its first quarter) had gained a certain position in the western horizon; therefore, it may easily be imagined that very few of those who dreaded, had had the honour of beholding, the sad visitant, who had for forty long years presented himself, in the vain hope, as it was supposed, that some generous being would overcome his fears so far as to draw near and make the usual demand in those cases—"What seekest thou, fair ghost?"

John Hageman, as I observed before, was one of the bravest, as well as one of the gayest of all the youths of the village; and as fond of listening to a good story on a Sunday evening as any one, but not being possessed of the credulous organ, he would not believe one jot or tittle of the tale of the terrible apparition of the wood.

"You may swear," said he one day to old Joe Haywood, who was a way-faring man, and forlorn, and used as often to seek his bed at the hedge-side upon the moss-covered sod, as ask from the human family a cold-granted shelter from the dews of the night. "You may swear till you are black in the face, Joe," said he; "I'll not give credence to your tale until I see the thing with my own eyes, and not then if I've been drinking, which you do so often, that you see double, and then it is no wonder that you should conjure up a thousand things equally strange and fanciful, and I fear that you will die some day of a drunken fit."

"Good, now, friend John; that puts me in mind of the epitaph I have been making."

"Epitaph! for whom, Joe?"

"For myself, to be sure—who else would do me that kindness, think you? Why not a creature, from the king to the beggar, who have shaken hands with 'honest old Joe' in the day when his eyes stood out with fatness, and his cheeks were rosy with the juice of Newtown pippins. No, no, master John, not a stone, nor a bush will mark the spot where the idler is laid. Therefore have I written mine own epitaph—a mere impromptu, but nevertheless true."

"Here lies one! Who do you think?
'Tis old Joe Haywood—give him some drink.
Drink for a dead man! The reason why?
When living, he was always dry."

"Go, get you to the cellar, Joe, with a flagon. Now, what a good Falstaff that fellow would make, if he were a degree more drunken, or less brave;" and John Hageman mounted his gray pony and cantered off to pay his accustomed visit to the girl of his heart, it being Sunday evening.

When he reached the haunted spot in the wood—"The moon is in its first quarter," thought John, "and the night promises fair. Now I am determined upon knowing two things this night before I sleep. Firstly, whether Mary, the idol of my fancy, will marry me, or no—and, secondly, who the spirit can be that plays his gambols hereabouts. I'll find him out, or he is a cleverer ghost than I take him to be; and Mary must make up her mind before the moon goes down. On its curved horn one might hang a halter, forsooth—a fair promise for a hay making season." And John was soon seated by the side of Mary, where we left him a few periods since, listening in breathless silence for her final response to his startling proposal.

"You must indeed, Mary," he said, in a voice scarcely audible.

The maiden gazed in earnest attention at the splendid crescent as its pearly light gave a less distinct view of objects around the nearer it approached the western horizon.

"I can wait no longer," cried John, and he pressed the hand of Mary as if it were for the last time.

"I am thine, John Hageman," uttered the maid in her own sweet tone, and she hid her beautiful face in the bosom of her lover, who imprinted a kiss upon her fair temple.

"Adieu, my own Mary," he said; "one week more, and I will not have to pronounce that hated word which now separates us for a season." And John had reached the wood ere the sound of his adieu had ceased to vibrate on the ear of Mary.

A few moments more brought him to the haunted spot, but the beloved object of his heart had so completely occupied his mind that, notwithstanding his resolves respecting the discovery of the apparition, he would have passed the hollow without giving a thought to it; but it was not so ordained, for so suddenly did the gray pony stop, that if John had not been the best horseman in the world he must have been thrown to the earth. He cast a look forward to find what had so alarmed the animal, which was trembling with dread and terror.

"By my faith, yonder it is, sure enough!" cried John, and with a feeling quite new to himself, he slowly dismounted and cautiously approached the object of his astonishment—the headless phantom! For a minute he stood before it and contemplated its figure with a full and careful survey, during which his imagination was wrought up to the highest pitch.

"Speak, I pray you, speak, unhappy shade!" he exclaimed. "Why haunt you thus this solitary nook? Have you ought to reveal? If so, say it, I entreat of you, and depart in peace to the lone and dark recess to which those murderous hearts condemned you."

Here he paused for a reply, but heard no sound except the heavy breathing of the affrighted pony, and the "wood-pecker tapping the hollow beech tree."

"There can be no harm in touching it," thought he; and he extended his hand and grasped—instead of the withered arm—the dry branch of a small decayed oak! John immediately recovered his presence of mind.

"There, I told Joe it was all a cheat; the light of the moon shining obliquely on this insignificant stump, has effected the singular deception that went well nigh to shake my fortitude."

Hageman mounted his pony and rode gaily home, to forget the "spectre of the wood," and dream of his Mary.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

THE lovers of music were gratified by a rich treat on Monday evening. A good deal of excitement prevailed, occasioned by Mrs. Austin and Signorina Da Ponte coming in contact on the same evening, for the first time. It was certainly a bold step on the part of the latter; and though it would be unfair to institute a minute comparison between a comparatively unpractised singer and one of established celebrity, we can safely and with pleasure say, that Signorina Da Ponte acquitted herself in a manner calculated to sustain the opinion entertained of her powers by her more moderate admirers. The way in which this young lady was brought before the public was, to say the least of it, extremely injudicious. Extraordinary expectations were raised, which only extraordinary powers could satisfy; and such powers, either natural or acquired, we believe it will now be pretty generally allowed by musical men, Signorina Da Ponte does not possess. This is, of course, saying nothing in her dispraise, for not one in a million is gifted with all the requisites necessary to constitute a first-rate singer: even Pasta and Malibran—women with whom it would be folly for a moment to compare Miss Da Ponte—have deficiencies. In the literary world it has become a settled rule, that every new novelist, possessing a sprinkling of talent, should receive his praise in the form of being set down as inferior only to the author of Waverley; and in this city it has also become a settled rule, that every fresh vocalist is the legitimate successor to "the Signorina." This is certainly a short critical cut, and saves a vast deal of trouble, as it requires neither judgment nor discrimination to simply make the assertion; but unfortunately there have been so many "legitimate successors," that this convenient phrase is getting into bad repute. We ourselves recollect some half dozen who have, according to the papers, filled this vacancy, to wit, Mrs. Knight, Mrs. Austin, Miss George, Madame Feron, Miss Phillips, and Signorina Da Ponte. But it is only with the claims of the latter that we have at present to do. Her voice by some is thought to be a mezza soprano, by others a soprano. It certainly possesses considerable compass, but it is by no means equal or of the first quality. It is what is technically termed a "head voice," that is, the upper notes are formed in the upper part of the throat instead of coming full from the chest. The lower notes are formed in the chest, and have considerable power, but some huskiness; the middle ones are inferior in mellow richness to those of Miss George; the upper ones superior to that lady's, which become thin as she ascends the scale. But again, Signorina Da Ponte's upper notes are inferior in clearness and distinctness to those of Mrs. Knight, and in force and flexibility to those of Madame Fe-

ron. Her style is good. She has evidently been well taught, and has profited by her instructions, though she as yet sings rather with the diffidence of a pupil than the confident reliance on her own powers of an accomplished professor. The deficiencies of her voice may for ever prevent her rising to the top of her profession; but by close study, and above all, frequent practice, she may attain a high degree of excellence. To do that, however, she must not be flattered into quiet satisfaction and self-complacency with what she has already acquired, but by honest candour made sensible that she has yet much to learn. Those who pursue the latter course will eventually be found to be this interesting young lady's true friends.

We have frequently expressed our opinion of Mrs. Austin, but a few observations on the quality of her voice, and a peculiarity in her manner, may not be out of place. Nature has gifted this lady with a voice that, with the exception of Madame Malibran's, has, in many respects, never been equalled in this country. It reminds us more of that of Miss Stephens than of any other European vocalist. It is of great compass, including usefully two octaves and a half, and may possibly reach three octaves, though not with the ease necessary to render all the notes effective; but it is not so much for this that we admire it, as for its remarkable purity and sweetness. The most acute and practised ear would probably find a difficulty in detecting a particle of harshness in its whole range, and its liquid tones come as softly upon the sense of hearing as snow upon the water, or dew upon the flower. In the words of the poet, they

"fall as sweet
On the listening ear,
As the odours on the sense,
When the summer's close is near."

These tones have the true "dying fall," for and for them to make "most sweet music" in the utterance, is just as natural as for the rose or woodbine to fling its fragrance on the summer wind—neither can help it. We do not believe more delicate sounds can be borne upon the air, than are breathed forth in some of her cadences, those she executes for instance, in the song of "Oh father, since that fatal day." The flexibility of her voice is equal but different from that of Madame Feron's. The one is a rapid and quivering succession of sounds, while the tones of the other fade away, and melt and blend together like the lights and shadows of an harmonious picture.

Mrs. Austin, favourite as she is, has not had justice done her on one point—the peculiarity we before alluded to. She relies too much upon the goodness of her voice, and lacks judgment, or rather dramatic tact, in the management of it; and this is the reason why she does not oftener produce what is termed a "sensation," but remains content with being uniformly delightful.

To those who have paid much attention to theatrical singing, the meaning of this will be very obvious. As Puff observes in the Critic, there is a great deal in hinting to the audience when to applaud, and herein Mrs. Austin is deficient. We have heard singers go through a song miserably, but towards the conclusion gather their whole strength for what is termed a coup de force:—they approach the foot-lamps with evident marks of preparation about them, look the audience in the face, as much as to say "I am going to do something wonderful!" they then do it, and afterwards look at them again as much as to say "I have done it—why don't you applaud?" and ten to one but they do get applauded to their heart's content. Now we have seen Mrs. Austin execute the most difficult passages, but with so much ease and facility, that the audience looked upon it as a matter of course, and thought there was nothing particular going on: they fell into the very common but erroneous belief, that in singing, what is done easily can be easily done. We know it is the perfection of art to conceal art, and so far Mrs. Austin is right; and in a room filled with consummate judges this would be quite proper, but it is bad policy before a miscellaneous audience, who never sufficiently appreciate delicate and unobtrusive beauties. We have even seen singers with rather harsh voices gain credit for much sweetness, merely by managing skillfully to contrast a few soft tones with the surrounding harsh ones; they went upon the principle that "every thing is by comparison," and succeeded, while voices of far more natural and uniform sweetness passed unnoticed. So true it is, that in this world of ours, putting what is called "a good face upon the matter," is half the battle, and real merit often fails, while empty but bold pretension is triumphant. As long as things are as they are, a little of this stage-effect in singing is not only admissible, but necessary, and we advise both Mrs. Austin and Signorina Da Ponte to pay some attention thereto.

GENEROSITY.—To be truly generous, is never to make a boast of the actions you have done.

the first indications of his early genius, must have been greatly increased by the unfavourable situation in which he was placed in a new country, and attached to a sect whose religious scruples do not admit of the cultivation of the fine arts. Still we find nature and genius triumphed over every impediment. At the early age of seven it is recorded of him that he made a drawing in red and black ink of an infant niece, of whose cradle he had charge, though he had never seen a picture or engraving! With this infantile attempt his mother was so delighted, that some encouragement was given to his pictorial tastes, and we find him as a school boy, making rapid progress in the art of drawing birds, flowers and animals, with pen and ink, all of which were added to his juvenile portfolio, and kept with care as proofs of his precocious talents. A remarkable circumstance at length befell him, which perhaps decided his future greatness. He learned from a party of straggling Indians the art of preparing colours, such as they use in painting their bodies, and in ornamenting their belts and weapons; these with a piece of indigo furnished by his indulgent mother, composed the first pallet of the future president of the Royal Academy; the tail of a black cat, furnished brushes for the youthful artist, and his painting materials were thus complete.

At the age of sixteen he obtained the consent of his relatives, to allow him to embrace painting as a profession, which he studied at Philadelphia, and subsequently practised successfully at various places in his native country until 1759, when his enthusiastic love of the art induced him to embark for the classic shores of Italy, to study the works of the first masters. On the day he attained his twenty-first year, he sailed from Philadelphia, and, in due time, landed at Leghorn, and proceeded to Rome, where he was greatly befriended by Mr. Wilcox, the author of Roman Conversations, and Mr. Robinson (afterwards Lord Grantham,) who promoted his interests both by procuring him access to the best models, and by finding employment for his talents. Devotedly attached to his profession, it is not to be wondered that he sacrificed his health in the arduous and continued occupations in which he was now engaged. Describing this period of his life, he would say, "he saw nothing but sublime pictures; they were his wonder by day, and by night the visions which equally haunted and hindered his sleep!" The sea coast and relaxation restored him, and he quickly returned to his delightful task, and succeeded in making himself familiar with the chefs d'aurres at the principal collections in Italy; several of which he copied, laying the foundation of that finished excellence which he afterwards so pre-eminently exhibited.

After four years spent in this manner, Mr. West finally quitted Italian studies, and went to London by way of Paris, where he examined the galleries and museums, and reached the British capital in August 1763. The principal collections in England received his speedy and eager attention, and a combination of circumstances led him to give up his purpose of returning to America, and to resolve on settling in the mother country.

About the period Mr. West made this resolution, the well known association of artists, established in London, in 1760, had formed a new era in the arts in England. Mr. West furnished for their exhibition in Spring Gardens, two pictures painted by him at Rome, together with a portrait of General Monkton, which obtained for him a very prominent share of public notice and distinction. The artists were incorporated in 1765, and Mr. West was made a member and director of the newly constituted body. In the same year he married a lady to whom he was engaged before leaving Philadelphia, and who was conducted across the Atlantic by his father. In 1768, George III. established the Royal Academy, and in its first public exhibition, appeared West's picture of Regulus, painted expressly for the royal founder, in which the artist was so eminently successful, that it not only procured him popular applause, but also the countenance and friendship of his sovereign, as long as he retained his conscious faculties. On the death of Sir Joshua Reynolds in 1791, Mr. West was elected president of this institution, a situation which he filled with a brief interruption until the time of his death in 1820. From the period when our distinguished artist first arrived at celebrity to his decease, he successively filled the honourable and important stations of historical painter to the king, surveyor of the royal pictures, a member of the Dilettanti Society, a member of the Society of Antiquaries and of the Society of Arts, a governor of the Foundling Hospital, and a member of the Royal Institution. Numerous other distinctions were heaped upon him by eminent foreign ladies and princes. The preferment of knighthood was also offered to him by George the third, but was respectfully declined.

We cannot pass over the enumeration of the public honours awarded to this great artist, without narrating an anecdote, given on the authority of a personal friend of Mr. West's, which we believe has not met with general circulation. During the short peace of Amiens in 1802, when Buonaparte was first consul, the president of the Royal Academy was amongst the crowd whom curiosity prompted to visit the gay metropolis of France. His fame was then spread over the civilized world; and, in a country so devoted to the arts as France is, it may be supposed that he met with universal attention. Mr. West had determined before leaving England, for some private reasons of his own, to decline any presentation at the court of St. Cloud, to which he was given to understand he would have been a welcome visitor, and in pursuance of this resolution, he remained inflexible to all the solicitations made to him on the subject. While at breakfast one morning, he was surprised by a visit from one of the directors of the Louvre, who came to invite him to be present at the gallery of the institution that day, to inspect some busts which were about to be erected. Mr. West accepted the invitation, and they proceeded together to the gallery, where the artist was quickly surrounded by the members of the institution, all of whom were attired in their official costume. Presently a bust in the antechamber announced some unusual occurrence; in a moment the doors were thrown open, and Napoleon entered in his little cocked hat and simple uniform, surrounded by a splendid cortege of thirteen generals. "Where is the president of the arts in England?" was the abrupt interrogatory of the first consul. The president made rather an awkward appearance thus taken by surprise. "Well, Mr. West, you would not come to visit me, and therefore I am compelled to come to visit you." Some complimentary discourse succeeded this first address of the future emperor, and they proceeded through the Louvre, conversing on various topics. At length Buonaparte, paused before a bust, folded his arms, and turning to his English visitor, "Mr. West, if I had my choice, I would sooner be the original of that bust, than any man I ever heard or read of." "I was burning," said Mr. West, while relating this anecdote, "to tell him, that he had it at that moment in his power, by sacrificing his ambition, and establishing the liberties of his country, to be the very man." It was the bust of Washington.

It is impossible even to enumerate the many noble productions of his pencil during his long and laborious life; the detail would fill a volume. He claims the honour of emancipating the art of painting from the mannerism of imitation, and of founding a school drawn from the fountain head of nature. His celebrated picture of the death of General Wolfe afforded a splendid proof of the theory he had sought to establish, that the dress and fashion of the day might be bent to every purpose of pictorial representation, without the accessories of Greek or Roman costume and mythological deities, which before were crowded into the canvass, to impart a dignity to the subject meant to be commemorated. The powers of Mr. West appear to have grown with his growth and strengthened with his years. His Christ Healing the Sick, Death on the Pale Horse, and the splendid picture of Christ Rejected, lately exhibited in this city, are all the productions of his advanced years, and are sufficient proofs of his vigorous and improved talents.

In public and in private life he was alike worthy of admiration and esteem. His biographers all unite in this eulogy on his character. He is also described as being entirely free from mercenary motives in his pursuits. His memory is untainted with the slightest odium of traffic in print selling or picture dealing, or any of those trading jobs which degrade the noble profession he was devoted to.

In his disposition Mr. West was calm and cheerful. There was a certain even gravity in his manners, which ever inspired respect. His appearance also was mild and placid, and a great simplicity marked all his habits, modes of expression, and principles. He died on the tenth of March, 1820, at the advanced age of eighty-two. His remains were interred with great pomp and ceremony in St. Paul's cathedral.

INEQUALITY OF GENIUS.—Even Homer sometimes nods, and no writer is uniformly the same. The true poet Homer is always great if compared with others; not always, if compared with himself.

MODESTY.—Individuals who practise a discreet modesty, never placing too high a value on their services, will prevent the envy of the world, and essentially promote their own interests.

LETTER WRITING.—The great secret in epistolary correspondence is to make your letters the complete transcript of your thoughts, as in conversation, without the affectation of wit, or a mawkish parade of sentiment.

LITERARY NOTICES.

MR. VANDERLYN'S PAMPHLET.

"THE sciences, letters, and the fine arts do not always enrich those who cultivate them, and it should be the pride of government to render them assistance." The truth of these remarks (recently made by a distinguished member of the French legislature on the subject of pecuniary appropriations) will be probably acknowledged even by those very individuals who, urged by private interest, or some impulse of a political nature, care as little for "the fine arts," as a hunter in full pursuit of the fox does for the modest flower which spreads its gentle beauties in his way. What does alderman B. of this ward, or assistant alderman C. of that, care for the fine arts? Suppose some young artist, with a mind whose enthusiasm had caused him to neglect his pecuniary affairs, his personal comforts, and even his health, should go up into the feasting apartment of the honourable common council on the fourth of July, just as the turtle soup was placed steaming upon the table by the side of the sirloins of premium beef peculiar to such occasions—suppose just as the worthy city sage should have tucked a napkin under his chin, and settled all his other preliminary arrangements, the slender and intellectual aspirant after ideal beauty should interrupt him in his useful and interesting operation, in order to direct his attention to some beautiful work of Rembrandt or Corregio—with what emotions would he be received? Judging from the interest generally displayed by that enlightened body, and by the protection which they have lately extended over one individual, we should deem such a mistaken intruder very lucky if he escaped without a visit to the house of refuge or the lunatic asylum. What? Is it to be conceived that amid the vast pressure of business, the deep designs, the profound calculations of the corporation, the putting up and tearing down of houses, the cutting away of dirt banks, the opening of streets, and the erection of pumps, fire-engine houses, and wooden fences, they can spare time to attend to "the fine arts?" And yet Napoleon occasionally had something to occupy his time and attention. A trip to Malta, a jaunt over the Alps, a peep into Palestine, a bath in the Red sea, a few days in Africa, a descent upon England, a step over to Moscow—but these were mere trifles, which did not prevent that sensible and industrious young gentleman from cherishing the arts and sciences by judicious pecuniary appropriations, and frequently by personal investigation and interference. Poor fellow! if, instead of perishing upon his lonely rock, he could have been transplanted by some magic into our common council, we question whether all the old wooden hovels in the city would have so absorbed his faculties as to have allowed him to inflict upon Mr. Vanderlyn, and through him upon the character of the city, the useless injury which that individual has lately suffered in the loss of the Rotunda. Mr. Vanderlyn is well known to the community as an artist of merit and fame. He has contributed much to impart to foreign countries a knowledge of the progress effected by this nation in the fascinating art to which he has devoted his talents; and his "Ariadne," a sweet picture, universally and deservedly admired, obtained the prize from the Academy of Arts at Paris.

It has been complained of Washington Irving that he has quitted the country of his birth, and by residing abroad, and identifying himself with foreign nations, he has, in a corresponding degree, lost his individuality as a citizen of his own, and forfeited his claim to our regard. Silly as this idea certainly is, let us see how bright it shines in the light reflected upon it from Mr. Vanderlyn's history.

He did adhere to his country. Praised and patronised abroad, he hastens home; and has in the pamphlet before us published a brief account of the manner in which his confidence has been sustained and his hopes realized. From this it appears that in 1817 the city authorities granted him the privilege of erecting a building for panoramic exhibitions upon the public ground at the corner of Cross and Chambers streets; that is, they granted him a lease of the lot, we believe, for ten years. In this lease he entered into no obligation to construct a durable edifice, but was at liberty to run up any temporary tenement; and if the slightest idea had been entertained by him that there would be any difficulty in effecting a renewal of the lease, as the house was to be built at his own expense, he would not certainly have incurred the cost of any thing permanent or very valuable. The profits would thus have gone towards the completion of his own designs, instead of being swallowed by the claims of the builders. But no, with a generous confidence destined to be lamentably betrayed, he laid out twelve or fourteen thousand dollars in the ornamental and expensive building called the Rotunda. The demands of the builders are yet unliquidated; but the prospects of the projector were never more flattering. With great labour and expense a number of splendid panoramic views had been already exhibited, among which were the city of Paris, and others. Arrangements had already been entered into by which the public were insured of a succession of the panoramas of St. Petersburg, Naples, Venice, the disinterred ancient city of Pompeii, the city of Lausanne on lake Lemane, Cadiz, Edinburgh, Sir J. Moore's retreat from Corunna, Rio Janeiro, &c. Nothing was wanting to ornament the city with a source of amusement as instructive as it is innocent and delightful, but the renewal of the lease, when the present common council, without inquiry either into the situation of Mr. Vanderlyn, or the appropriateness of the building for the purpose for which they designed it, unceremoniously ordered the occupant to quit the premises, and thus wrecked at once his hopes and the advantages which resulted from his long perseverance, and ruined a laudable and growing institution sanctioned by the public approbation and founded on the exertions of one individual and his friends! We are at a loss to determine the cause of this proceeding; whether it emanates from a narrow and ill-timed spirit of economy, or has been brought about by personal animosity, or the fraud of interested persons, the public seem to have formed the almost unanimous opinion that the measure is unjust, and as circumstances have occurred, bordering on the ridiculous. The unfortunate temple of the muses was stripped of its decorations. In place of the silent repose, and the rich shadowy light which give a charm to a gallery of paintings, we were now to hear the interesting assembly who congregate to be edified by the example of poor wretches caught in petty larcenies, bigamy, and the like. But it seems that Apollo had no intention of submitting tamely to the insult, but employed some mischievous imp of a spirit to perplex all the proceedings. The court assembled. "Old Hays" hallooed "hats off" and "silence," to the obedient mob; the jury were impanneled, the lawyers mended their pens and cleared their throats, and a gentleman, whom the chances of life had apparently plunged into some considerable embarrassment, both of a pecuniary nature, and also others calculated to diminish his respectability among his fellow-citizens, was placed at the bar and ordered to "hold up his right hand," and then to "take it down," after the grave and dignified solemnity of court ceremony; but when the trial commenced the naughty devil also began to execute his abominable plans without any fear of being committed for contempt, and taking the character of an echo, mocked with indiscriminate and unrelenting insolence, the claims of the plaintiff for justice, the prayers of the defendant for mercy, and the eloquent arguments of the worthy magistrate who held the scales. As this unexpected, invisible, and unwelcome intruder would neither listen to reason himself nor let other people listen, and as moreover it was discovered that neither constable nor marshal could lay hands upon his shoulder, but that not contented with ridiculing all the pithy arguments of judge and counsel, he even proceeded to the desperate extremity of mocking "old Hays" himself, replying to his startling demand of "silence!" with a repetition in a tone of absolute impertinence and disrespect; therefore it was determined to abandon the premises to the insulted muses, who will, we sincerely hope, be allowed to resume their old domain, and under the auspices of Mr. Vanderlyn flourish for many a long year to come.

THE FINE ARTS.

NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

THIS interesting exhibition is now open, and is well worth the attention of the public, not so much because it is a display of native talent, as because it is a display of genuine talent. The people of all countries, and of this particularly, are often made to pay pretty dearly in a variety of ways for their patriotic feelings, by the skilful use of the word native, and therefore it is not on this account we would call attention to the Academy of Design. We cannot conceive any thing more pleasurable for our fashionables to diversify their monotonous stroll in Broadway than by spending an hour or so in a gallery of pictures, where young gentlemen may pass, with the utmost ease, for men of vertu, and fair ladies lip forth bad criticisms in the most bewitching manner. It is, however, to be feared that the living skeleton, Mr. Calvin Edson, will prove a formidable rival to the two Academies, it being a much more pleasing and interesting sight to look upon a living anatomy than to contemplate the embodied conceptions of genius. Our visits heretofore to the Academy of Design have been but brief, and our remarks must consequently be the same, not being possessed of the great quantity of talent, and matchless quantity of impudence, requisite for criticising a room full of paintings, by half an hour's glance at them. Among the most attractive in our eyes are, "A view of lake Windermere, England," by Cole. It is a fine transcript of one of those glorious scenes to be met with amid the lakes of Cumberland and Westmoreland; scenes which afford no bad illustration of the point of union between the sublime and beautiful. "Dr. Caius, Simple, and Quickly," from the Merry Wives of Windsor, at the time when Caius finds Simple concealed in his closet, by Weir, is admirable; and "The Antiquary introducing Lovel to his womankind," by the same artist; this is a picture peculiarly agreeable, both from the skill with which it is painted, and the associations connected with it. The face and figure of our old friend, Jonathan Oldbuck, and his sister Griselda, are both very good; but still we like those of his niece, Mary McIntyre, better than either. The countenance of the young lady in particular is strikingly national, and no one at all acquainted with the Scottish physiognomy could possibly mistake the country to which she belonged. The figure of Lovel appears too full, formal, and mature for that of the elegant young officer. It is a great pity that this species of composition is not more encouraged. What an infinite variety of bold, striking, picturesque, humorous and pathetic subjects would the Waverley novels alone furnish! There are a number of delightful landscapes, by Doughty, C. V. Ward, Wall, and others. We were a good deal struck by those of a young artist, J. C. Ward; they give high promise of future excellence. There may be slight faults in the colouring and mechanical execution of parts of his pictures, but the delightful repose, and almost loneliness of some of his scenes, show that he possesses that poetical temperament and delicate perception of the loveliness of nature, which cannot be taught. There is a spirited portrait of a "Child with a Dove," by F. S. Agate. We have received the following lines, from the pen of an unknown correspondent, designed to illustrate it:

With fairy dreams and thoughts of joy
Hope wakes to life the slumbering boy.
With early morn he is up and away,
With a spirit as light as a cloudless day.
The birds are awake, for out the grove
Comes many a chirping note of love;
The flowers are tipp'd with a golden hue,
And shake from their folded leaves the dew.
The sky is bright with the morning light,
The earth is gay with the blossoms of May;
But earth nor air cannot compare
To the joy of the boy with the golden hair.
He tosses his locks in the balmy breeze,
As he hastens away to the forest trees;
He has chased the butterfly down the dell,
His winding path he knows full well;
The winding path and the tangled way
He has bounded through in his sportive play;
He has wandered through places untrod by men,
Where echo sleeps in the silent glen;
Where objects are seen in the twilight gleam,
Like the vision of hope in a painter's dream.
He has tamed the wild doves from the forest shade,
As through the gathered gloom he stray'd;
He brings them forth to the glorious day,
And they follow him on his winding way;
Around they fly with wavering wings,
Or flutter near like fairy things;
Or poised amid the ambient air,
Like guardian angels hovering there;
Then sailing away till they're lost to the sight,
In the gorgeous glow of the morning light.

In the morning of life the heart beats free,
And the soul is stirr'd with an ecstasy;
Then our pleasures are innocent, pure, and bright,
But filling and thrilling our soul with delight;
For in after years we account it a joy
Even to dream of a happy boy;
To live o'er again, and again to dwell
Near the scenes that our childhood loved so well;
For the morn of our childhood still charming appears,
Though dimly seen through the mist of years;
And nothing is nearer allied to bliss
Than the scenes of youthful loveliness.
And when the poet for heaven prays,
He means but the scenes of his early days.

The great fault of the exhibition, or rather defect, for it is not the fault of any one connected with it, but that of the egotistical particles which make up the public, is the great number of portraits. Portraits of ladies and gentlemen meet the eye in every direction; and not even the splendid talents of Inman and Ingham, principally exercised in this branch of the art, can reconcile us to the undue preponderance of "the human face divine" in the exhibition, though it is rather amusing to mark the quantity of fierce intelligence which many gentlemen with whiskers, and some without, have studiously thrown, or tried to throw, into their faces, as the painter was about to transfer them to the canvass. The portraits painted by A. L. De Rose evince a decided improvement in the style of this artist. Notwithstanding, however, the drawback to be made on account of the great number of faces, most of whom, with the exception of the ladies, are of no interest to any but the owners, the time will be well and pleasantly employed that is spent at the Academy of Design. It deserves, and it is to be hoped will meet with encouragement.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Columbia College Alumni.—The foster-sons of this venerable nurse of classic and scientific lore, assembled once more on the fifth instant, and renewed, under the shade of their loved sycamores, those pledges of attachment and union which they had formed in the earlier and happier periods of their existence. The orator chosen for the day was Judge Irving, well known to the public for the extent of his learning, the purity of his life, and the suavity of his disposition. These qualities were strikingly illustrated in the eloquent and appropriate discourse delivered to a highly select audience. The judge took a rapid survey of the progress of learning in this country, warmly applauded the patronage which had been so liberally bestowed by the constituted authorities of this state on elementary education, and deplored with equal justice, the unpardonable neglect and indifference shown to classical studies and the higher branches of learning. The transition to a zealous defence of the utility and beauties of the studies taught at college was natural and easy, and most happily introduced. The life of President Samuel Johnson furnished a fruitful theme for the display of the speaker's attachment to the industry, amiability, and extensive learning of his teacher. He then closed in a pathetic peroration, pertinently addressed to the fond associations and renewed friendships of his assembled brethren. The discourse was throughout chaste, manly, and impressive—marked with good sense, lofty feeling, and amiable retrospections of the past.

In the evening, the alumni partook of a social repast, which was graced by the presence of some of our most eminent scholars and clergymen, appropriate toasts were drunk, and the day closed in harmony.

House of Industry.—Seldom have we been called upon to record the foundation of any institution which promises more permanent, as well as direct benefit to our population, than that of the House of Industry. On Thursday last, a highly respectable concourse of citizens assembled at the City-hotel, and after selecting his honour the Mayor as their chairman, proceeded to pass resolutions in favour of establishing a society for the purpose of erecting an edifice in which the poor who are out of employ, might at all times find opportunities to exercise their industry profitably to themselves and to the institution. Such a one has long been wanting in this city, and its successful operations cannot fail to remove one of the most fruitful sources of pauperism, and its endless and harrowing train of sufferings. The assistance to be afforded by it comes not in the questionable shape of charity, which too often creates demands upon itself by its very liberality; but it strikes at the root of the evil, and thus extirpates it altogether. The common council will be applied to for co-operation in this practically benevolent project, and their aid, almost indispensable, will surely not be withheld. The public voice will support a liberal appropriation in behalf of so great and good an object.

Biographical Mania.—The eagerness with which every species of biography is read in the present day has led to the adoption of this phrase, and ridicule has not been sparing of its lash to the furnishers of this much sought for information. The taste may, however, be defended.

"The march of intellect," so called, has rendered nearly every man of only limited acquirements a thinker and an observer, and the result of this improvement is, that public characters are scanned with a minuteness and a severity unknown to our progenitors. We are not now contented merely to see the senator enveloped in his toga, fulminating his philippics, or pouring forth his eloquence in the forum; nor are we satisfied with the more public exhibition of the judge or the counsellor, surrounded with the insignia of office, and supported with the reverence attached to a court of justice. We delight to follow them into the privacy of domestic life, and see how they act, divested of those appurtenances which claim respect from "vulgar minds."

The divine must be disrobed of his band and cassock; and the soldier shorn of his plumed helm and mailed front, is required to appear in his private character, to stand the scrutiny of their fellow men. Authors and artists also are not exempt from the general unveiling; but must be content to withdraw from the bright halo of fame and splendor with which they are usually surrounded; and, arrayed in their "dressing-gown and slippers," are compelled to stand the test of the universal gaze. And is there not an advantage in thus denuding public men of all the pomp and mystery of office and situation? Most assuredly there is; more especially in a republican government, where the ruling men of the times should be known as they really are.

THE STRAWBERRY GIRL.

AN ORIGINAL SONG, COMPOSED AND ARRANGED FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR, BY WILLIAM WOOD, JUN. OF THIS CITY.

MODERATO.

From the cot in the vale where my fa-ther was born, Around which the wood-bine in love-li-ness twines, I come with the ear-li-est blush of the morn, While the dew on the flow-ers in pu-ri-ty shines, To gain for my mo-ther, and yet in-fant bro-ther, An hum-ble sub-sis-tence to pas-sers, I cry, "Ripe straw-ber-ries, ripe! ripe straw-ber-ries, ripe! Oh! my ripe straw-ber-ries, buy, pri-thee buy."

SECOND VERSE.

In yon humble grave, near the lightning-struck tree,
My father reposes in sleep with the dead;
And my mother has none, save my brother and me,
To cheer fleeting life, and supply her with bread.
Then, oh! for my mother, and yet infant brother,

With a heart light and innocent, cheerily I cry,
"Ripe strawberries, ripe! ripe strawberries, ripe!
Oh! my ripe strawberries, buy, pri-thee buy!"

THIRD VERSE.

I feel not the toil, for 'tis sweeten'd by duty,
I heed not the taunt which oft reaches mine ear,

For I oft tell my tale to compassionate beauty,
And solace receive from the heart-gushing tear.
Then still for my mother, and yet infant brother,
With a heart light and innocent, cheerily I cry,
"Ripe strawberries, ripe! ripe strawberries, ripe!
Oh! my ripe strawberries, buy, pri-thee buy."

VARIETIES.

BENEVOLENCE AND GRATITUDE.—The manner of conferring a benefit, is of much more importance than the intrinsic value of the favour bestowed. If the obliged party be made to feel too sensibly the weight of the obligation, the term malevolence is more appropriate than that which commences this paragraph. Some benefits (as they are called) are so loaded with the donor's manner, that the weight of the burthen smothers the flame of gratitude, and virtually cancels the obligation. It has been justly observed, that "if patrons were more disinterested, ingratitude would be more rare." A person receiving a favour, is apt to consider that he is, in some degree, discharged from the obligation, if he that confers it derives from it some visible advantage, by which he may be said to repay himself. Ingratitude has, therefore, been termed "a nice perception of the causes that induced the obligation;" and Alexander made a shrewd distinction between his two friends when he said that Hephaestion loved Alexander, but Craterus the king. Rochefacault has some ill-natured maxims on this subject; he observes "that we are always much better pleased to see those whom we have obliged, than those who have obliged us; that we confer benefits more from compassion to ourselves than to others; that gratitude is only a nice calculation whereby we repay small favours in the hope of receiving greater," and more of the like. By a certain mode of reasoning, indeed, there are very few human actions which might not be resolved into self-love. It has been said that "we assist a distressed object, to get rid of the unpleasant sympathy excited by misery unrelieved," and it might, with equal plausibility be said, that "we repay a benefactor to get rid of the unpleasant burthen imposed by an obligation." Butler ridiculed this kind of reasoning, in the following observations:—"He alone is ungrateful who makes returns of obligations, because he does it merely to free himself from owing so much as thanks."

SACRED MUSIC.—It is difficult to account for the neglect generally displayed in the families of this city respecting sacred music. It can scarcely be that it possesses less intrinsic beauty than the lighter and more popular melodies of the day. Handel, Mozart, and Haydn are above the reach of common praise. It speaks much for the taste of our Boston friends, that on the sabbath morning the piano is not condemned to silence, but the productions of those eminent composers are practised, in order to be correctly sung in the congregation, or for the no less agreeable purpose of family worship. We all know how music,

"dear music! that can touch,
Beyond all else, the soul that loves it much," contributes to promote the mental tranquillity so favourable to devotional exercises. We recommend it to the consideration of our lady readers, with the assurance that the admirers of rich vocal harmony will find the interest of the sabbath much enhanced by so delightful an employment.

INFLUENCE OF THE DRAMA.—That the drama has lost much of its influence over the public mind, is a fact incontrovertible, and may be referred more to the deteriorations of dramatic composition than from any want of power it possesses in forming the taste or correcting the morals of a community. Satire may wield its shafts with unerring aim through its medium, and the follies of the times, embodied by its representations, can be reflected with an accuracy and fidelity which will render them perceptible to the dullest capacity or to the most inveterate self-blinded egotist.

DANGEROUS WEAPONS.—The most dangerous of edge-tools is a talent at repartee, in conjunction with a vindictive spirit. How many speak daggers, who dare not use them. An old proverb says, "banter but never crimson the cheek." Strong and sharp as our wit may be, it is not so strong as the memory of fools, nor so keen as their resentment. He that has not strength of mind to forgive, is by no means so weak as to forget.

GEORGE F. MORRIS, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

Published every Saturday, at the corner of Nassau and Ann streets.—
Terms four dollars per annum, payable in advance.—No subscription received for a less period than one year.

BEYRON, PRINTER, JOHN STREET.

NEW-YORK MIRROR,

AND LADIES' LITERARY GAZETTE.

VOLUME VII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 22, 1830.

NUMBER 46.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

VISIT TO THE GRAVE OF A FRIEND.

"Ek sibi terra levis, puella dignissima vita."

HERE will I pause—to view the hallowed spot
Where thou, young loved one, dost in silence sleep;
Ah! well I feel thou canst not be forgot,
While sighs are left, or tears are mine to weep;
For this lone heart will mourn thy hapless lot,
Long as its core one saddened thought can keep:
Thou wert so good, affectionate and fair,
I thought not death would aim an arrow there,
'Twas sweet, when day's tumultuous toils were done,
To join the circle round our social hearth;
To meet thee there, the gayest, fairest one,
And lose awhile our cares in harmless mirth.
'Twas sweet with thee in gladsome mood to run,
In early spring, along the verdant earth.
Well I remember with what sylph-like tread,
And buoyant breast, thy form our path-way led.
Such scenes are past! and months have fled since I
Followed thee, fair one, to this cold, cold tomb;
Then many hearts stood clothed in mourning by,
And many eyes were sunk in sorrow's gloom,
To see a bud just opening, fall and die,
Ere they might gaze upon its ripper bloom.
Oh! it was hard—when thou wert torn away,
And death's dark cloud hid virtue's dawning ray.
Here, 'neath this stone, all lonely thou art laid—
Sunken and death-sealed are those bright eyes now;
Those raven curls are left in dust to fade,
While grave-worms revel on that spotless brow:
And that fair form, where once the graces played,
Has lost its action, and that breast its glow.
The hopes—the charms that early youth just gave,
All, all are quenched, and blighted in the grave.
All? No, not all—a soul like thine may dare
The monster death, and triumph o'er his might;
For virtue cried, and virtue's God was there,
To bear thee victor near his throne of light.
I'll weep no more! but only seek to share
A sleep so calm—a destiny so bright.
Thou' welcome, grave—thou'lt be a tranquil home,
O'er whose dark portal sorrow cannot come. C. C. V.

TO THE EDITOR.

Excuse me, that the Mercury
Who carries letters off for me,
I, in my haste, the other day,
Forgot to charge the post to pay;
Nay, I forgot to give the needful,
(Another time I'll be more heedful.)
I am ashamed of this neglect,
Because I never could suspect
That my offences (not a few)
Have e'er provoked a hint from you.
I know politeness must belong,
Of course, to every son of song;
Yet I'm aware that editors
Are forced to add the saving clause
Which says "all postage must be paid"—
It was a rule in wisdom made,
Or else no office could be got Half large enough to hold the lot
Of wisdom, wit and sentiment,
Which would from every part be sent.
Their weight would burst the groaning mail.
Post-horses in their speed would fail;
The price of spectacles would rise,
And editors would spoil their eyes.
I am aware that poetry,
However welcome it may be,
However spirited and fine,
Won't help an editor to dine,
Or pay his bills, or e'en produce
Once every year a Christmas goose,
Or feed the grate, or light the taper,
Or pay for printing or for paper.
All this experience bids me know,
And from her school what lessons flow!
So I, (the truth I must confess)
My fine effusions oft suppress,
Because I've not the ready shilling
To pay the postage, though I'm willing.
But, pshaw! I hate apologies—
A word's sufficient to the wise,
'Tis for the sake of rhyme, not reason,
I send you this excuse in season.

LYDIA.

MARGARET.

While others sing of war's alarms,
The hero's worth, the patriot's duty,
My strain shall tell the sweeter charms
Of innocence and beauty.
And how, when Margaret is the theme,
Could I refuse to weave the song?
Who e'er heard music in a dream,
Nor would that dream prolong?
She bade me write. I can't forget
The witchery of that little minute;
That silvery tone—I hear it yet—
Persuasion's self was in it.
And then those eyes, that downward sent
Their diamond splendour!—that was kind;
Had they on me their lustre bent,
I surely had been blind!
The faultless form, the winning grace,
The bounding step, and airy glee,
The pure mind speaking in the face,
Ah! they have charms for me.
Long live that little fairy flower,
Blooming and blushing like a rose;
It graces well its native bower,
And round a gladdening freshness throws.
And never may the storms of care
Bow down that modest floweret's head;
But gentle dew, and genial air,
A constant, kindly influence shed. CONWAY.

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

NEW SERIES.—NUMBER IV.

ONE night the Genius came to me with sadness in his face; for, although he is a spirit, he seems endowed with human affections. He hates the bad and loves the good, with the fervour of the young and enthusiastic among my own fellow-creatures. When he bids some delicious scene of nature spread itself out before me, as the dim mists of the mirror change into the ruder outlines of the picture, as the forest stirs its mass of luxuriant beauty to the breeze, and the river comes winding in among the rich clover fields and around the lonely hills, I have seen his face lighten up with rapture, as a painter's does while he flings in the finishing touches of light and shadow upon some favourite landscape; and then, when these warm, sweet images fade away, when the silver stream disappears in the darkness, and its sleepy music is hushed, when the green earth vanishes, and the light of heaven passes from the clouds, and it becomes necessary in his illustrations of human life to conjure up some unhappy object, some wretched captive in the gloom of his dungeon, the hushed chamber of death, beauty withering beneath the poisoned breath of disease, or capable and lofty genius bent down and broken-hearted by misery or guilt, I have marked the expression of sorrow steal over his radiant countenance, as the shadow of a cloud darkens the bosom of a sunny hill. It must be this resemblance in our nature which has brought him from his spiritual world to visit so insignificant and unassuming a student as myself; and I love him more for those tokens of human feeling than for his power over mind and matter, and his freedom from the laws of time and space.

I had been thinking of internal improvement, and what course my beloved country should now pursue to ensure her future safety, and expedite her career to glory and happiness. The Genius knew my thoughts, and smiled.

"It is sometimes right for you, young student," he said, "to exchange the contemplation of personal hopes and fears for that of the prospect of the world around. He who has never endeavoured to make others happy can never be truly so himself. In one without power to control great passing events this is a harmless and useful indulgence. It prevents the selfish feelings from obtaining a too powerful mastery over the heart, because it discovers to us the relations of things with each other, as well as their relation with ourselves. But if thou hadst authority to regulate the actions of the millions of thy countrymen, an accurate understanding of the subject would be as requisite as a wish to serve."

"My country," said I, "could not be much benefited by any individual, however clothed with wealth and honour. The cup of its happiness is filling up to the brim as fast as the nature of human affairs will permit. We are at peace with all foreign nations, and blest with prosperity at home; our public debt will be speedily extinguished; the people relieved from taxes, the comforts of life will flow in abundantly, and every common labourer can enjoy his share: palaces and temples are rising around us, roads and canals enrich the land, institutions for instruction and cheerful recreation are growing up, and all is peace."

"Alas," said the Genius, "that the highest state of prosperity, the most liberal laws, the best constitution, cannot meet the wants of the people—still there will be poverty and wretchedness. Still there may be grinding oppression, which they can neither relieve nor prevent."

"I cannot see," said I, "how this can be. Our country is free; we have no privileged classes, no nobility, no aristocracy."

"It is true," he replied, "you have no nobility, who receive the direct sanction of your laws, but wealth forms a nobility almost equally well defined, and with it come power and privileges."

"Every one," said I, "cannot be rich, but the way is open to all. Industry, talent, good fortune, must always obtain advantages, and the materials of society will arrange themselves according to these after any convulsion, as the waters of a turbid stream when they have been agitated settle down again into tranquillity. Poverty must exist in every community. Some are idle, some sick, and others extravagant or unfortunate. It is so in every nation, and cannot be helped."

"Thus," said the Genius, "the pampered children of luxury and ease smother up their sympathies for the wretched, or they who are too weak or too careless to contemplate the abuses which might be redressed, compromise with their feelings by ascribing them to necessity. You mortals are selfish beings. Misfortunes make you miserable, and that is an excuse for the cold neglect of others. Prosperity fills you with rejoicing, and what time have you then to go out among the dwellings of the obscure and unhappy, or to study and act upon any subject relating to their interests? Statesmen are busy with their own schemes of narrow avarice or personal ambition. The young and the fair go forth in the haunts of fashionable pleasure, and will the youth turn away from a sweet bright face to labour in the cause of humanity? and will beauty withdraw from the gaze of admiration to waste her silvery voice on the ear of age and affliction? Perhaps there are within the circuit of your boasted city instances of anguish as acute as your nature is capable of enduring. Beautiful young children are flung upon the world, mere victims of ignorance, idleness, and guilt; fine intellects are wasted; and many a female who, with the factitious aid of dress, would lead all hearts captive, perishes in the protracted agonies of poverty, guilt, disease, and death. And it is not that this is unknown, but that it is not seen. So long as the gushing tears of female misery are not falling in your sight, so long as the dying shriek is not ringing in your ears, your heart is at rest. To a certain extent this is a blessing, for it guards you from the pain of dwelling continually upon what you cannot alleviate. But when any relief is to be afforded, what in the former case would be weak and unmanly sensitiveness, becomes deep and active benevolence. It pervades the feelings, it flings a charm and a chivalry around the character, it expands and elevates the mind with enlarged views, and pure and generous ambition, and imbues multitudes with the spirit of true charity. And when a being inspired by it starts forth alone from the thronging crowds who are pressing on to gorge their appetites and sate their passions, he beholds scenes to which other eyes are blind, and if the discovery of much sorrow shades his mirth with sadness, his heart enjoys an ennobling satisfaction in the endeavour to relieve it which never thrilled through a common heart. But look in the glass."

There was a neat country house in the midst of a grove. The scene had a bright look. The luxuriance of the foliage, the bursting forth of the fruit, the height of the clover, with its modest fragrant flower fraught with sweets, and the strength of the honeysuckles, which had wound their wreathing tendrils around the columns which supported the piazza, disclosed the summer, and the sun's expanded disk and horizon

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

THE RAMBLER.—NUMBER EIGHTEEN.

MORALITY—HORSE-RACING.

THERE is a kind of people who, instead of finding "Sermons in stones, and good in every thing,"

are gifted by nature with a peculiar quickness in perceiving and detecting vice and wickedness in every variety of form and complexion. They have an aptitude in raking and scraping together all the bad which is generally mixed up with worldly pursuits and amusements, and of overlooking whatever of good may be mingled therewith. Whether this intimate acquaintance with evil habits and feelings—this familiarity with the obliquities of human nature, is to be accounted for upon the principle embodied in the shrewd proverb of "set a thief to catch a thief," ought to be left to people more charitable in their constructions than themselves, or the verdict would not be at all flattering. The worst of the matter is, that they claim this sharp perception of the vile and vicious as a sort of merit, and account it pure stern morality harshly to censure what they dislike in the conduct of others. They take a one-sided view of all things, try them according to their own standard of propriety, and so decide that they are altogether right or altogether wrong: they cannot bring themselves to see that "the web of our life is of a mingled yarn, good and ill together," that "our virtues would be proud if our faults whipped them not; and our crimes would despair if they were not cherished by our virtues." This is rather too reasonable and philosophical a view of the question for them, and in reason and philosophy they profess to place but little faith. These very infallible personages have seen or heard that there are such things as foolishness and frivolity in ball-rooms, and therefore, without taking into account the innocent mirth and harmless gaiety which predominate, they set down balls as very foolish and frivolous affairs; they have seen or heard that there are specks of immorality and dissoluteness to be met with in a theatre, and therefore set down a theatre as a concentration of all that is dissolute and immoral; they have seen or heard that blacklegs, vagabonds, sharpers, &c. attend race courses, and therefore set down all that go as blacklegs, vagabonds, or sharpers. They are great generalizers, and account a man who stands and looks at one full-blooded horse running against another as a species of monster, incapable of discharging the moral and social duties of society.

There has always been a particularly large quantity of cant abroad on the subject of morality; and the foundation of this cant appears to be laid in an erroneous belief of the extreme susceptibility of human nature to impressions of either good or evil. Men's morals, like their constitutions, are more permanent and durable than is frequently imagined, and neither so easily destroyed or mended as mental and medical hypochondriacs would have us believe. A man beholds a discreditable action or hears a questionable speech, and is no worse for it; or he sees a virtuous action and listens to a lecture containing the most excellent advice, and is no better for it. This is the case ninety-nine times out of a hundred; and it takes a long familiarity with either good or evil to make a permanent impression on one with any pretensions to stability of character. Nothing can be more childish than to hear the advocates or opponents of the stage, for instance, endeavour to settle its general tendency by picking out little speeches and sentences either for or against morality; and the mistakes to which this habit of looking at details and neglecting the sum total have given rise, are very curious. Many a play, like a man, has acquired a good character by sounding words and lip-professions only. An author will make a well-meaning peer or potentate declaim upon vice or virtue in the abstract, or in cases far removed from common life and every-day occurrences, and gain much credit for the excellent tendency of his drama; while Gay's "Beggars' Opera," which exposes in plain language the disgusting selfishness and utter want of feeling and principle in characters and amid scenes which take place under our very noses, has been more than once hissed off the stage for its immorality! So much for consistency.

For my own part I always loved horse-racing, and even when a child, and the qualities of horses were totally unknown to me, exhibited an incipient propensity for betting by making tiny wagers on the colours of the riders. Since that I have seen many a race, and never found my health, morals, or temper any thing the worse for so doing. It is a fine sight at all times to look upon a good horse; but to see one of the noblest of a noble species led on to the race-course previous to starting, his polished skin glancing and glistening in the sun as he moves gracefully along, is as glorious a picture of animal nature as a poet or painter would wish to behold. What fire and expression are in his eye! what a union of strength and beauty in his finely moulded limbs! How light and elastic is his step—it seems as if it would scarcely crush the young grass on which he treads. And then to see him matched with another, or others, like himself. The anxiety you feel about the fairness of the start—the quickened pulse and rapid circulation of the blood during the race, and the all-absorbing interest of the final struggle, are indescribable, and I am sorry for those who have never experienced them. But then, cry your cold, fish-blooded moralists, this occasions betting, and betting is gambling. Such a consequence by no means follows; but admit it for the sake of argument. What is this to the gambling that is carried on in Wall-street or other high places of Mammon? Is not the cotton trade gambling? Are not manufacturing speculations gambling? And is not the banking system gambling, or something worse? Yet who ever hears of the immorality of those grave concerns? And as for betting, men will bet on some subject or other, and a horse-race is perhaps the very best thing they can exercise their talents upon.

"Most people, till by losing rendered sager,
 Will back their own opinions by a wager," is true enough, and accordingly men bet on all things—on the death or marriage of their friends—on the election of their magistrates—on the reconsideration of Mr. Noah's appointment—on their own weight, height, or circumference, or the weight, height, or circumference of their neighbours. Then again the consistency of some very good people who look with horror on the betting of a dollar whether one horse runs faster than another, yet who I know invest large sums in lottery experiments—the worst, because the most foolish species of gambling. But the truth is, the world is made up of people who, as Butler says,

"Compound for sins they feel inclined to,
 By damning those they have no mind to."

A volume composed of the lives or anecdotes of celebrated race horses would be an interesting study to the naturalist, the physiognomist, the craniologist, and the philosopher. A race-horse is an intelligent being, and not a mere machine urged forward by a man upon its back. Some of them are as capricious and fanciful as a fine lady, and some as obstinate and self-willed as a doctor of laws; while others again are equally as sensible and intelligent as those who bestride them. I was intimately acquainted with a horse of this latter description, well known to all who interest themselves in such concerns, by the name of Doctor Syntax. On many accounts this animal was more remarkable than either the English or American Eclipse, and there were perhaps more romantic and eventful incidents in his life than in that of any animal that ever started. A horse is termed aged when it is above six years; eight or nine years are looked upon as a very long time for him to continue on the turf, and twelve are accounted a wonder. This horse continued running until the remarkable age of sixteen; and had from his natural good sense, and long and extensive experience, acquired a fund of practical information and intelligence on racing subjects that was quite remarkable. It was curious to observe the coolness and composure with which, when winning, he would turn his head and look at his straining competitors. Among his other feats he had for a great number of years in succession won the principal prize at one race-course, (Lancaster.) His owner, who was immensely rich, and to whom the pecuniary gain arising from his winnings was as nothing, had at last determined to withdraw him from the turf, but against his better judgment was prevailed upon to let him run once more over his favourite course, at the same time publicly announcing that, beat or beaten, this was to be the last of his races. An intense interest was excited. All the knowing ones, who considered him too far "declined into the vale of years," bet against him, while the ignorant country people, who used with affectionate familiarity to term him "the old Doctor," were his supporters. Several fine young horses, many of which had not seen the light of day, and others were not thought of when the venerable Doctor was in his prime, were entered to contend with him. The race began, and though he could have left them, or such as them, far behind in his best days, time had evidently done its work upon him. He kept the lead, however, until near the winning-post the last time round, when his strength began to fail him and the others were evidently gaining ground; one in particular was within a head of him; the noble creature saw this and exerted himself, of his own free will, to the uttermost—for he was a high-minded horse and stopped on the instant if either whip or spur was applied to him—he would not run "upon compulsion." Of the vast multitude assembled every man held his breath, and not a sound was to be heard—even interest was unthought of, and betters bawled no longer. The struggle was short but decisive, and the Doctor once more passed the goal a winner, though by the veriest trifle. Then were the tongues of the multitude unloosed, their mouths opened, and forth

—"One universal shout there roared,
 Louder than the loud ocean; like a crash
 Of echoing thunder!"

while the animal staggered, or went forward a little way by the force of his impetus, and then fell to the earth! He was immediately bled, recovered, was decorated with ribbons, and led off the course as much an object of universal attention, and as deservedly so, as Alexander the Great, when he entered Babylon. Best of quadrupeds! long and gratefully will he be remembered by his backers and admirers. He now passes the remainder of a green old age amid the rich park scenery which Washington Irving so well describes. I hope this long episode will be forgiven by the readers of this paper. Let them not look down upon it, because the subject of it was a horse. In numerous qualities, not only physical but mental, he was infinitely superior to many a biped, whose memoirs are obtruded upon the public in two volumes octavo.

In the accompaniments of horse-racing the courses here are yet far behind those in England, that is, in the neatness and cleanliness of places of refreshment. It is really a pleasant sight over the water to see a race-course, with its rows of white tents and fluttering colours, almost like the encampment of a small army. Each of these tents is divided into snug compartments, and its occupiers are concealed from the general gaze by linen as white as snow; and tea and coffee, and all sorts of refreshments, are comfortably provided, instead of swallowing bad spirits or worse wine, standing at a dirty bar, and jostled on all sides by others making their demands. One great cause of the difference is, that here respectable females generally do not go to races—there they do. A person bent upon drawing inferences would make this out to be a good or bad sign of the state of society, either one way or the other. It is no such thing, but a mere difference of custom. There a lady goes to a race-course just the same as one here goes to Niblo's or Castle garden, and is as comfortably accommodated. It is perhaps to be regretted that this is not the case here, as their presence materially contributes to preserve that order and decency, which are apt to be infringed when a large body of men get together, with no such check upon them. The distance of the Long Island course from this city perhaps occasioned their absence in the first instance, and its being now looked upon in the light of an impropriety, will very likely perpetuate it. C.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

PORTRAITS OF CELEBRATED CHARACTERS.

THE RIGHT REVEREND REGINALD HEBER, D.D.

Late Bishop of Calcutta.

IN presenting to our readers this brief sketch of the life and labours of this truly christian prelate and accomplished scholar, it is our design to draw their attention to the extremely interesting particulars of his life, coupled as they are with his short but arduous exertions in his pastoral capacity in British India, a copious and authentic account of which is now preparing for the press in this city, written by Mrs. Heber, and to which our imperfect notice may afford some preparatory information as to the engaging and edifying materials which are at the disposal of a biographer so well qualified for the task as the lady is represented to be who has undertaken the office.

Reginald Heber, second bishop of Calcutta, was the son of the Rev. Reginald Heber, of Marton, in Yorkshire, England, and was born April twenty-first, 1783, at Malpas, in Cheshire, where his father was then possessed of a living. His mother was the daughter of the Rev. Dr. Allanson, of Yorkshire. He may be said, therefore, "to be of Levitical descent." From his earliest childhood he gave promise of those christian graces with which he was afterwards so richly endowed. The Bible was the book which he read with the most avidity, and from this early application of his powers he laid the foundation of that masterly knowledge of the scriptures, which he afterwards possessed, and to which nearly all his future reading was made directly or indirectly to contribute. At the grammar-school of Whitechurch he received the elementary rudiments of a classical education, from which he was removed to the care of a clergyman, who took charge of a select number of pupils, for the purpose of preparing them for college. In the year 1800 he was admitted into Brazen-nose College, Oxford. After pursuing his studies at this ancient seat of learning for one year, he obtained the chancellor's prize for a Latin poem

"Carmen Seculare," which, as the production of a youth of eighteen, raised the highest expectations of his future success, anticipations which were more than realized by his splendid "Palestine," produced in 1893, written for the prize poem of that year. The success of this production was unprecedented. It was not merely read at the college, rewarded by a medal, printed for the benefit of admiring friends, and then forgotten, but it was set to music by an eminent professor, by many it was committed to memory, and it was generally read. An English essay on the "Sense of Honour," for which he also received the prize, completed his academic honours, and he quitted the university, retaining all his native modesty, and bearing with him the love and esteem of his contemporaries. "From that moment to the day of his death," says Sir Edward West, the chief justice of Bombay, "his course was one track of light, the admiration of Britain and India."

From Brazen-nose College he was elected to a fellowship of All-souls, and soon afterwards went abroad, to visit such parts of Europe as were at that time open to the English traveller. Accompanied by a friend, he made the tour of Germany, Russia, and the Crimea, keeping a journal, which was submitted on his return to that distinguished traveller, Dr. Clarke, who urged its publication. The modesty of Mr. Heber would not yield to this request, and Dr. Clarke availed himself of several of its passages, which were appended as notes to the doctor's own travels; the entire journal, however, will be published in the forthcoming life of Bishop Heber, which we have before alluded to as being prepared by his widow.

Having returned to England, he was presented to the living of Hodnet, in the county of Salop. He married Amelia, the daughter of Dr. Shipley, the late dean of St. Asaph, and thenceforward willingly devoted himself to the duties of a parish priest, a charge he faithfully performed, assiduously visiting his parishioners, and endearing himself to all ranks of society by his affectionate and truly charitable disposition. The poor at Hodnet were his especial care; he was their adviser and their friend; and no better proof of his excellence can be offered, than in describing the general grief which pervaded this little parish when the news of his premature death reached them, which is said to be "as if each inhabitant had again lost their friend and director."

Active, however, as the life of Mr. Heber was, it was still a studious one. Though his congregation were for the most part unlettered, his sermons are represented as being peculiarly rich, flowing, and metaphysical, conveyed in appropriate language to suit the capacity of his auditors, and full of that scriptural knowledge which ever formed one of his chiefest attainments.

From 1808 to 1815, he became known to the reading public by some critical essays, furnished to the Quarterly Review, both theological and literary, and an admirable ordination sermon, printed at the request of the late bishop of Chester, before whom it was delivered. In 1822 he published the life of Jeremy Taylor, with a review of his writings; a work which is alone sufficient to carry his name to posterity. About the same time he was called to fill the eminent post of preacher at Lincoln's Inn, an office never conferred but on acknowledged talent. This appointment necessarily brought him to the metropolis for a portion of the year, and afforded a wider field for the display of his abilities; the result was his nomination to the bishopric of Calcutta, which had suddenly become vacant by the death of Dr. Middleton. Yet not rashly nor unadvisedly did he assume the functions of this high episcopal office. He at first declined the proffered elevation; at length, after the deliberation of a week, he accepted the great work, from an imperious sense of duty alone, and determined to enter upon the arduous and dangerous situation he was called upon to fill, with the fullest sense of its responsibility.

On his arrival at Calcutta every demonstration of kindness and respect was shown him, and the happiest results were anticipated from the influence and exertions of such a character amongst the mixed population of that extensive country. He succeeded in conciliating the affections of all classes, and produced a reverence for his sacred calling not usually awarded to the christian minister in this seat of luxury and splendour. We cannot trace him through the multifarious occupations which now engaged his attention, rendered more arduous by the infant state of the episcopal establishment there, and the general laxity of religious principles even amongst the European settlers. It will be sufficient to say that they were performed with a zeal and fidelity which produced the most beneficial effects on those to whom his labours were directed. In 1824 he performed his first visitation to the upper provinces; a journal of this long and interesting pilgrimage is already before the public, written with the pen of a poet, and the piety and truly christian philanthropy—characteristics which eminently distinguished Bishop Heber through his short but useful career.

In 1826 he again departed from Calcutta for the visitation of Madras and the south of India. He reached Trechinopoly on the first of April of the same year, having performed a greater part of his intended visits; on Easter Sunday, on the third of the same month, he preached, and afterwards held a confirmation in the fort church. Having returned home warm and exhausted with his labours, he took a cold bath before breakfast. The attendant thinking he remained longer than usual in the bath, entered the apartment and found him prostrate in the water. The alarm was given, and medical aid immediately procured, but the vital principle was extinct. A vessel had burst upon the brain, attributed to the sudden plunge into the cold water in his then excited state.

He was buried on the north side of the altar of St. John's church, at Trechinopoly, and every demonstration of respect was shown to his memory by the three presidencies of India. Sepulchral monuments were erected at Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay, and it was determined to found a scholarship for the last named presidency at the college in Calcutta, to be called Bishop Heber's scholarship. H.*

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

ADVANTAGES AND DISADVANTAGES OF GENIUS.

THE term genius, in its general acceptation, has been defined "as being the talent or aptitude we receive from nature for excelling in any one thing," a definition we shall adopt in our remarks on the subject, confining ourselves more particularly to the influence it exerts over the individual possessor of the faculty.

The ramifications of genius are as diversified as is the nature of the beings in whom we see it embodied. We find it in the dark ages illuminating the confined circle of human knowledge, enlarging the orbit, and spreading by its influence every useful and ornamental art. In more refined periods we see it combining the known with novelty, and producing by such combination the most pleasing and elevating knowledge the mind is capable of attaining. With the ancients its influence spread (like the orb it may be compared with) light, and life, and vigour over all their undertakings. Embodied in its favoured possessors of those periods, genius gave energy to the statesman, courage to the warrior, and magnanimity to the patriot.

In literature and the arts, it raised for itself shrines at which succeeding ages have offered up the incense of fervent admiration and devotion, which will remain as splendid monuments to attest its power, until language shall be extinct, or intellect cease to be the God-like attribute of man.

While cursorily noticing its general advantages, the inventive powers of genius may well claim our attention. What a vast and luminous field is here opened for our admiration and eulogy! The catalogue of inventions in science and in art, which owe their sole existence to genius, would fill volumes in detailing. We cannot turn to the most trifling minutiae of necessary comfort, nor to the refined enjoyments of luxury and of taste, but all are the results of this creative faculty, enriching and enlarging the resources of civilized man.

Thus connected as genius is, with every pleasurable feeling and with all useful acquirements, it is not surprising that its effects have been so highly valued. The ancients awarded to genius divine honours and unfeigned devotion, and the later ages of the world have not been deficient in their acknowledgments to the bright emanations from the same glorious faculty.

We now proceed to trace its effects on the individual possessor. The proud depository of genius rises above his fellow-men, sublimated by the ethereal qualities of which he is composed. He "Glances from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven,

And, as imagination bodies forth,
The forms of things unknown," his mighty power
"Turns them to shape, and gives to airy nothing
A local habitation and a name."

A mind thus endowed appropriates the whole world and its productions to its own especial use, and entering into the vast arena of "nature's God," it discovers beauties which do not strike inferior minds. It clothes in the fervid colours of its own imagination every scene it witnesses, every circumstance with which it is attended—thus creating for itself an existence more elevated and more exquisite than is allotted to the dull and senseless individual who toils out his meed of days in uniform monotony, uncheered by the bright illuminations of this splendid gift. If devoted to the exclusive pursuit of sciences gratification when its inventive powers have solved some hitherto undiscovered mystery in the phenomena of nature, wherewith to enrich the stores of science, or has perfected some mighty undertaking which will rank his name among the illustrious benefactors of the whole human race!

Before closing this portion of the subject, we may notice the distinction between true genius and that false and glittering assumption of it, the prevalent characteristic of our age.

These pretended claimants to the aspirations of true genius have indeed some of the brilliant traits which distinguish the legitimate possessors of the faculty, and which are well calculated to dazzle and beguile the "million," but like imitations of the purer metals, they cannot pass the analysis of proper tests without discovering their alloy. They have, it is true, their scintillations, but like the meteoric track, which sometimes illumines the northern horizon, they glitter but for the moment.

"And leave not a rack behind."

We now proceed to consider the disadvantages attached to the possession of genius, more particularly when coupled with an enthusiastic imagination, or when not regulated by those strong principles of moral government which every man is called upon to exert in his intercourse through life.

The subject is a painful one, and the propositions we are about to adopt are at variance with generally received opinions on this head; but convinced of this melancholy truth, we venture fearlessly on the task, referring to facts recorded in the imperishable pages of history in support of the principles we shall endeavour to substantiate.

Shakspeare, with his usual felicity, has beautifully said that "Spirits are not finely touched

But to fine issues; nor nature never lends
The smallest scruple of her excellence,
But, like a thrifty goddess, she determines
Herself the glory of a creditor,
Both thanks and use."

Were such effects the constant attendants on genius, we need not expend much matter in illustrating the disadvantages attached to the character.

The possessor of this faculty we have already endeavoured to depict. Imaginative in the highest sense the term is capable of bearing, he revels in the indulgences of his own creative fancy with unrestrained indulgence. Forming for himself an existence of his own, he cannot, during the delirium of enthusiastic feeling, descend to mix with those grosser materials which compose this sublunary state of things. "Shrinking with fastidious delicacy from the common transactions of life, unless as far as necessity may compel him, he contracts a morbid sensibility of feeling, an excited irritability of temperament, so at variance with the equable tenor necessary to the holding our just position in society, that we may use the simple but expressive language of Burns, and say, "It is not easy to imagine a more helpless state than his whose poetic fancy unfits him for the world, and whose character as a scholar gives him some title to the politesse of life."

Another disadvantage attendant on genius is the constant danger there is of the possessor's soaring at every thing with in the reach of thought or action, however unqualified he may be, by the want of preparatory education or deep reflection; his rashness, like the fabled Phaeton, incites him to attempt the most daring tasks, exposing him not unfrequently to similar defeat and contempt. Hence the absurd theories, which mystify rather than enlighten science; hence the visionary and multifarious creeds which distract the calm inquirer after truth, and from hence too frequently occur those mental aberrations, the melancholy attendants on wild and unrestrained genius! It is also liable, from its pruriency of imagination to overrate its actual value; measuring itself by an inflated standard, and viewing things only through one distorted medium, it assumes an altitude of perfection or of consequence, which only renders its foibles and its follies more glaringly defective. While mounted on this self-elected pinnacle, scorning the trammels of society, and maintaining its own misanthropic superiority, it becomes a mask for ridicule to aim its shafts at, and an object on which morality may apply its well-deserved censure.

The frequent immorality of genius, unless prevented by the strong counteracting principles we have before named, is well deserving of a passing notice. With imaginations heated to excess, and judgments perverted, it surely cannot be argued that the moral temperament of the man can be equally cool as those calm, steady individuals, who pass tranquilly through life, unvisited by its brilliant irradiations, unmoved by its seductive powers. The mere fact of the contempt which genius, not duly regulated, most generally feels for received opinions,

It may be contended that the mind, which is constantly employed in the contemplation of every thing beautiful in nature and valuable in art, cannot but be touched with the sublimity attached to such subjects, and will be restrained from, rather than incited to, any dereliction from virtue. The arguments we have before adduced are here equally applicable, only viewing these objects with enthusiastic ardour and attachment; appropriating them but to one studied end, and considering them only as the works of supereminent excellence, or as fertile sources for developing the faculty it possesses, there is great danger of losing sight of any reference to that almighty power, which has created, and from whom is derived the pre-eminence of perfection so admired; looking also too frequently to natural causes, and straying amid a multitude of ingenious, yet wild theories, the revealed author of all things is neglected, and a reverence is consequently lost for the observance of those laws which have been accepted as the divine guide for all mankind.

The characteristics we have already traced as attached to genius are also at variance with that prudent and orderly attention to our interests in this life, which is indispensable alike for the preservation of integrity of character and independence of mind. Its poverty is proverbial.

"Genius is praised, but hungry lives and cold," is the melancholy truth described by Gray. "Wits live men know not how, and at last die obscurely, men know not where," is the sarcastic remark of the sage Roger Ascham. Unaccustomed to sober calculation, or to a just appreciation of the gifts of fortune, the possessor of genius is either heedlessly extravagant when fortune smiles upon him, or oppressed with disgust and disappointment when deprived of the advantages which wealth bestows; he becomes consequently overpowered by a morbid inactivity, and sinks under the weight of these combined feelings, the victim of his own weakness and imbecility. To all these may be added the contumely and neglect, to which even the most acknowledged geniuses have been exposed; a glance at the lives of a few celebrated men, in various ages, will fully establish this melancholy fact.

Homer, we are informed, was an itinerant ballad monger. Plautus turned a mill for his subsistence. Terence was sold as a slave. Paul Borghese, the Italian poet, knew fourteen trades, yet was starved to death. Tasso struggled through a life of poverty, and laboured at times under mental aberration. Camoens ended his days in an almshouse. Cervantes suffered imprisonment and numerous slights, and at length died of want. Corneille endured all the ills of poverty and neglect. Racine left his family in such distress that they were afterwards supported by a pension. Milton has only been appreciated by the age which succeeded him. Spenser, the admired Spenser, died neglected and in want. Ben Jonson suffered numerous hardships. Fletcher, a cotemporary author, says of him,

"Poorly poor man he lived, poorly poor man he died."

Crichton (the admirable) lived on the supply of a day, and died in a midnight brawl. Butler was never master of fifty pounds. Dryden struggled through a life of indigence. Lee was confined four years in a mad house. Deccan, Cotton, and Lloyd, all suffered much from want, and all died in a prison. Savage is a striking example of ill-directed genius. Churchill died a beggar. Bickerstaff fled for debt. Collins passed most of his life in want, and died reduced to mental imbecility. Smollet suffered innumerable privations, and died neglected in a foreign country. Goldsmith gained but a precarious subsistence. Paul Hifferman died of a jaundice, brought on by want. Chatterton committed suicide, supposed to proceed from censure and neglect. Kirk White fell a martyr to the same refinement and sensibility. The fate of Burns is well known. We will not extend the catalogue further; the life of nearly every man of genius would furnish materials to support the proposition we have adopted. In the present day there is not, perhaps, so much neglect and apathy exhibited towards struggling genius as formerly, yet how few, even in this boasted age of liberality, attain the eminence they aspire to. Viewing, then, the manifest disadvantages attached to the possession of this faculty, it may perhaps be asserted, that mere rational intellect is a higher blessing than the gift of genius, however splendid. D.

A NOBLE REPLY.—The cardinal Dubois once sent for Boudon, an eminent surgeon, to perform a very serious operation. The cardinal on seeing him enter the room, said to him, "You must not expect, sir, to treat me in the rough manner you treat those poor wretches at the hospital." "My lord," replied M. Boudon, "every one of those poor wretches, as your eminence

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE METAPHYSICS OF MUSIC, AND THEIR ACCORDANCE WITH MODERN PRACTICE. IN THREE PARTS—PART THE FIRST.

"I say silver sound, because musicians sound for silver."

WERE you ever at a concert? If you ever were, the lines of your expressive physiognomy must have been "worth the marking." As you observed the nimble bows of the musicians dance, and quiver, and bound, upon the tortured strings, the conceit of the player, the affectation of the amateur, the nonchalance and lassitude of the fashionable loungeur, the men with pale stone faces, looking half asleep, like busts, the ladies attentive by starts, and then, ever and anon, relapsing into chit-chat; until vainly trusting for impunity to the noise of a "tutti," in some pitiless overture, they are at once betrayed, by some sudden pause of a bar, which the composer (who cannot himself tell why) has interposed at so inconvenient a juncture. As you gazed upon all these things, I suspect your countenance must have discovered some distinguishing signs of lurking scepticism as to the merits of so strange a scene. Do not be alarmed—the matter is between ourselves. Far be it from me to attempt to seduce you into putting your imprimatur upon any set of unfashionable opinions. That is not your way—still one cannot help thinking, that had doubts and difficulties not been sticking like a remora to the bottom of your understanding, you would ere this have put forth an unanswerable exposition of the sublimities of modern music. You must own it is strange, that the admirers and cultivators of modern science have not invented any thing like a consistent theory of musical expression—nay, that the vague ideas of most writers on music, with relation to its expression, embody the very principles, which in their full extent are most inimical to modern practice. Nor will it be less odd, if musical reasoners, as well as composers, have just admitted into their works meaning enough to show their abuse of those laws upon which it is naturally founded. To come, however, to the point.

Music may be briefly defined to be the poetry of sound. It seems to be agreed on all hands, that its province and end is to express poetically, by means of inarticulate sound, certain passions and feelings incident to human nature. This is involved both in the practice and phraseology of all musical people. From the earliest times, the lover has interested his mistress, and the general excited his troops, by means of music and song; and composers have, from time immemorial, affixed to their compositions, words and expressions of direction, which imply that the pieces to be played either have, or pretend to have, some connexion with the feelings of the auditor. We have as many marginal hints as in a German tragedy, and much to the same purpose, and generally quite as much needed. Now if a tune is to be "amaroso," or "maestoso," or "agitato," or "pastorale," or "spiritoso," in plain English, if musical sound is to express sentiment or passion, it can only do so in one of these two ways. Either the notes singly, or in some known combinations, must, as words are, be understood to be arbitrary signs of the things to be expressed by them; or else they must express passions and feelings by copying so nearly, that the likeness may be recognised, those sounds which nature has appropriated to the expression of those passions and feelings. The first of these modes has never, I believe, been contended for. Arbitrary significations have indeed been attempted, by fanciful individuals, to be affixed to the peculiarities of the tones of different musical instruments; but these fancies have not been generally received. To the notes or divisions of notes of the musical scale, however, meanings of this sort have been never attributed. Crotchets and quavers have never been invested with the powers of letters; neither have they been made to stand for whole words, like the characters of the Chinese alphabet. It should seem then, that if melody is expressive at all, it must be so by imitation—and by imitation of that which is sufficiently familiar to the minds of men in general, to render likely a general recognition of the resemblance. That peculiar intonations of voice, in the expressions of certain passions and feelings, are common not only to whole nations, but, with some varieties, to mankind in general, is a fact that experience teaches. It is observable, too, that of all others, the people whose language has least variety of natural intonation, have been the least successful in music—I mean the French. The tones as well as the looks of love, jealousy, anger, revenge, joy, or despair, need only to be exhibited by the actor, to be at once felt and known. Tones, in fact, are of as great consequence as words, inasmuch as by varying them, a sentence of praise may be turned into one of irony, love into ridicule, and rage into humour. It is by a reference, then, to these well-known intonations of passion, that the meaning of a combination of musical sounds is to be ascertained. But the imitation is not a servile one. The musician, like the poet, is to preserve a rhythmical regularity; he is to conform to certain laws and limitations; and, above all, to impart a poetical heightening to his euphonic delineations, without overstepping the modesty of nature. He is to marry the poetical to the natural in sound, neither dividing the substance nor confounding the persons; a delicate task, and one which exalts the original musician into a poet. He is a bard who expresses himself in musical instead of articulate sounds; and, to read his compositions, we must learn to sing or play, or else have them read to us by those who can.

It is this poetical imitation of the natural tones of passion, which is the origin and essence of musical expression. Other imitations have indeed been introduced into modern composition; but they do not deserve the name of expression, and are of a nature totally dissimilar. They, in fact, depend, for the most part, upon the peculiar tone of the instrument employed, and not upon abstract resemblance, as the poetical imitation of the rises and falls of passion must do. Thus we have storm-pieces for the piano-forte, in which the lower keys are rumbled into a sort of thunder, and the higher "tipped" to resemble drops of rain or hail. We have shrill fac-similes of the whistling of birds, and battles, in which the great-drum is thumped for cannon, and the kettle-drum rattled in the manner of galloping of horses; but to what do all these peculiarities amount? Why, to a proof that a piano-forte can rumble something like distant thunder, and "drip, drip," as Mr. Coleridge would say, like "water-drops;" that an octave-flute is not very unlike the whistle of a bird, and the percussion of a double-drum nearly as bad as the "report of a cul-verin." They delineate no passion, nor can they excite any, excepting indirectly, and by chance. The curiosity they gratify is trifling, and it can only be once gratified. One reason certainly, why compositions of this sort must please a certain class of hearers, is their artful and complicated mechanism—but more of this by and by.

Harmony is, or ought to be, the handmaid of melody. It cannot be denied, however, that it includes in itself the power of pleasurable excitement. For proof of the existence of this excitement we may appeal to facts. The sound of an Æolian harp, for instance, is pleasing, merely from the chords. The order in which they are produced is the work of chance. The excitement would seem to be direct, and to act strongly upon the nerves as a stimulus. Indeed, sounds produced simultaneously, for the most part, act strongly upon the nerves. The excitement caused by discords, however, is disagreeable, and with some persons so violently efficient as to induce that nervous affection, called "teeth on edge." In Mozart, when a child, it produced convulsions. That chord and discord are only varieties of nervous vibration, seems pretty evident, in the fact, that those who are incapable of pleasure from the one, are also nearly, in a like degree, insensible of pain from the other. The excitation from harmony has likewise, in some instances, been known to have brought on fainting and stupor, with persons of an irritable temperament. From all this it appears to follow, then, that the pleasure arising from harmony, be it as intense as it will, is a bodily rather than a mental pleasure. It is a dram taken by the ear, only the exhilaration is transient like that of the nitrous oxide. It does not act through the intellect, but goes directly to the nervous system. We must be allowed, therefore, to conclude, that the pleasure of harmony is inferior in its nature to that of melody; and that melody ought not to be sacrificed to it, nor put beneath it, as has long been the case. The invention of counterpoint has so far been the bane of melody. The mathematical has over-run the poetical. The mechanical has overlaid the intellectual. Nor is this to be wondered at. The thing is capable both of explanation and excuse.

It is asserted somewhere by Rousseau, no mean judge of such matters, that the musical world may be divided into three classes—Those who are capable of feeling the intellectual part of music, who are generally men with something of a poetical temperament, and no very correct ear for harmony;—Those who have an ear for harmony, and a taste for harmonious arrangement, but whose feelings are not excited by expressive melody, and who are, for the most part, men deficient in imagination; and lastly, Those who unite these two qualifications—a class, says Rousseau, rather rare. In this judgment of the celebrated citizen of Geneva, I must own that my limited observation, as far as it goes, strongly inclines me to concur. Now, if this idea be founded in truth, the consequent changes in the world of music are of natural occurrence; nor is it easy to conceive how they could have been materially different.

Before the discovery of counterpoint and of the present accurate system of musical notation, the science (if science it could be called) of music was limited to the composition and repetition of a few simple airs. The harmonies, when harmony was attempted, were mean and monotonous, and the composer or performer possessed little means and less inclination to improve this branch of his art. Indeed, if the date of many of the finest old airs be as modern as some contend, the indifference of the bards who composed them, to harmonious accompaniment, is almost incredible. They must of necessity have been aware of the improved arrangement of harmonies, and of the passion for that arrangement, which had then been spread, chiefly by the ministers of religion, over all Europe. Yet so little have the minds of the poets, who conceived those melodies, condescended to invest themselves in the trammels of science, that of those exquisite remains, there are few which do not violate some of the rules of composition, and scarcely any which, without injury to the melody, admit of a moderately full or scientific accompaniment. Be this, however, as it may, it is clear enough that the number of the individuals who lived either by the composition or performance of those airs, could not have been great, and in all likelihood was small. The whole of the known music about that period would, perhaps, not equal in bulk the thousandth part of the composition of the last ten years; and probably not one of the composers was the author of as many of those imperishable melodies as would fill a modern folio second page. The religious music of the ages prior to the invention of counterpoint, would seem to have been very deficient. It was necessarily simple; and where all passions save that of devotion were forbidden, melody naturally became either monotonous or unimpassioned; at last, probably both.

In this state of things counterpoint and the phrenzy for complete harmony, which to this hour is only subsiding, effected a radical and total change. A new order of men, that is to say, Rousseau's second class, became, from their numbers, and from the endless variety of which the description of music they cultivated is susceptible, the lords of the ascendant. The power of employing a multiplicity of voices and of instruments in chapels and cathedrals, was immediately turned to account. The church was omnipotent; and the "Maestro di Capella" was only another name for the best musician in the place. The expressive but simple airs of the obscure bards, who in all countries have composed what is called "national melody," were at once buried under an avalanche of motets, canons, masses, requiems, anthems, hymns, psalms, and chorusses. To these were quickly added fugues, symphonies, sonatas, duettos, quartetts, quintetts, and all the varieties of what has been called "chamber-music." It is a mistake to imagine that the complication of harmony has been a taste gradually acquired. It was a phrenzy sudden and irresistible, both from its novelty and from the real effects it is capable of producing. Those with the truest feeling of musical expression were naturally more or less captivated, like others, by the excitement of harmonious accompaniment. Those whose feelings were in the ear alone, rushed forward to claim pre-eminence for the elaborate and injurious additions which excited with such effect their grosser sensations. Science too was formally enlisted in the service; and mathematicians, with neither ear nor feeling, eagerly caught at consequence in a department where they had never dreamed of shining. The elegantly turned sentiment of Heinsius, "Harmonie pater est numerus," was carried to its full extent. Some of the wonderfully elaborate movements of the early harmonists show the extremes to which this mania carried them. Doubtless these harmonies were crude and harsh, and often barbarous, and later science has done much in sweetening their discordant chords, and refining their awkward modulations. Still as the knowledge of harmonics has extended, it is undeniable that harmonious composition has, upon the whole, been simplified. Hasse, Vinci, and Sebastian Bach, and then Handel, began to improve and polish the melody so neglected by their predecessors; and, as Dr. Burney expresses it, to "thin the accompaniments," that, like untrimmed underwood, choked up and smothered what they were meant to adorn.

When Godfrey de Bouloign, the great champion of the crusaders, was inaugurated king of Jerusalem, he was offered a crown, which he meekly declined, saying, that he would never wear a crown of gold in the place where his Saviour had worn a crown of thorns.

An ivory turner in London has just made his fortune in a singular manner: in sawing in two the tooth of an elephant, he found in the centre of it a diamond worth 13,000*l.* sterling.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Newspapers.—There is not an engine wielded by human hands which can, in extent of power and certainty of execution, compare with the public press. The abstract speculations of philosophy, the unerring deductions of science, the wily declamations of politics, as well as the grace and majesty of eloquence, the fanciful creations of poetry, and the sober realities of life, are all, by its sole agency, converted into tangible and perceptible forms, impressed upon durable materials, multiplied at will without number, distributed through whole populations, scattered far and wide to every corner of the earth, and even handed down to ages yet unborn. But that we are rendered familiar with this potent instrument, and come to regard it with the same indifference as, in ordinary moments, we gaze upon the spacious sky, the boundless ocean, and indeed upon creation entire, we would start in astonishment at the immense influence which it exercises upon ourselves, and mankind in general. There are some individuals, and those public men, who have professed to disregard the newspapers, and to be careless of their contents—of their praise or censure. Such professions are either false, or the result of conceited stupidity and self-deception. No man can or should be insensible to assertions which go abroad to thousands of his fellow-men, and which must, more or less, operate on their minds to his benefit or his injury. It is true that these vehicles of varied information and endless novelty are frequently made subservient to the advancement of the basest objects, and exhibit levity of the most disgusting character, ignorance the most unblushing, and virtue not the most unquestionable. But this is an abuse—and to its toleration we must submit rather than to a censorship, or entire suppression of so generally useful and necessary an organ of the body politic. These evils will, in most cases, produce a re-action sooner or later, and thus destroy themselves. The good, however, remains; it is felt in the diffusion of useful information, in the general spirit of active intelligence which it creates and fosters, and in the more noble interest in public affairs, which, when ably conducted, it will never fail to inspire. Deep must be the regret of those who perceive—and who can fail to perceive?—the frequent abuses which creep into the press, even in this enlightened country; the low scurrility, the unpardonable levity, the indiscriminate and parasitical sycophancy, the bare-faced ignorance and even illiterate vulgarity, which too often deface and disgrace some of our largest sheets. We cannot conceive a situation more trying and responsible than that of the editor of an extensively circulated diary. It is in his power to deal forth good or ill to the community, to infuse a spirit of virtue, morality, and a love of knowledge, or to pamper the spirit of detraction, lend his countenance to the most debasing immorality, diffuse a depraved taste in letters, encourage laxity of conduct, and even open violation of the laws. Is this picture overstrained? It is easy to point out the proofs. But ours is not the painful task. The judgment of the public may slumber for a while, but it must overtake the guilty.

Benevolent and Religious Societies.—The anniversaries of a great number of these institutions are wisely celebrated about the same period; an opportunity is thus given for the mutual interchange of opinion, and for friendly intercourse between a large body of individuals united in a common effort to ameliorate the condition of their fellow-men. Amicable discussions thus arise, which often elicit fine specimens of oratory, and diffuse a knowledge of the purposes and the views of the representatives of different and far distant sections of our country. And as long as the friends and founders of these societies cherish a truly humane and universal spirit of toleration, and condemn all exclusive dictation or unwarrantable interference with the consciences of their fellow-citizens, so long shall public opinion befriend and support their efforts. We have not space to notice the different meetings in detail, and shall therefore content ourselves with a slight glance at some of the most prominent.

The "American Bible Society" held their annual meeting at their house in Nassau-street, on Wednesday the 12th inst. Delegates appeared from Maine, New-Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New-York, New-Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, Ohio, and Indiana. From the report of the board of managers it appears that the receipts of the last year were one hundred and seventy thousand and sixty-seven dollars and fifty cents. The total number of Bibles issued, two hundred and thirty-eight thousand five hundred and eighty-three. The total number printed, three hundred and eight thousand copies.

The "American Tract Society." The whole number of tracts printed during the last year is upward of five millions and two hundred thousand, and since the formation of the society twenty millions and three hundred and forty-one thousand. Whole number of pages printed, one hundred and eighty-six millions and a half!

"American Home Missionary Society." This society has assisted five hundred churches during the last year, and employed three hundred missionaries. Two or three hundred Sunday schools have been established.

"School Societies." These presented an unusual display of infancy and childhood, slowly ripening under the foster care of education and morality. The number of pupils was immense, and offered a delightful prospective of future usefulness and intelligence.

"General Union for promoting the observance of the Sabbath." Resolutions were passed inciting the members to continued exertions in behalf of the cause for which they had united. The Rev. Dr. Cox submitted the following additional resolution:

"That the members of this society being conscientiously opposed, as citizens of a free country, and as Christians, to any union of church and state, and to all laws for the observance or the desecration of the Sabbath, will continue to recommend its sanctification only by the influence of personal example, of moral suasion, with arguments drawn from the oracles of God, from the existing laws of our country, appeals to the consciences and the hearts of men, and fervent supplications to the Lord of the Sabbath."

Steamboat Competition.—Competition is the soul of business—the life of trade. It awakens ambition, stimulates industry, and elicits improvement. To its kindling spirit are we indebted for the splendour and refinement of modern art, for the development of skill and the inventions of ingenuity in the luxuries and conveniences of life. Our matchless packets which fly on the wings of the wind, and defy distance—our lofty warehouses vying with each other in the richness and beauty of their fabrics—our commodious, ample, and splendid edifices—the products of the arts—in short, all the artificial blessings which we so abundantly enjoy, undoubtedly emanate from that spirit of competition which incites men to excel each other for profit and fame. It is only however when the spirit is kept within proper bounds, that its effects are thus salutary. So long as the object of labour, traffic, or commodity is improved, the public is necessarily benefited. But it often happens that competition is carried on, not in attempts to improve, but to lower the value, in other words, to cheapen the price. And then the public are sure to suffer. They may at first be caught by the attraction of low prices, but they assuredly will be disappointed in the equivalent which they receive. Such it appears to us has been the case with the steamboats. We do not intend to assert that the original prices charged for conveyance on board of these useful, nay, necessary transports, was not extravagant. It may have been so: but then the convenience and safety, and even luxury of a conveyance on board, was tenfold what it is since the prices have been so immoderately reduced. There surely is a medium rate which might be agreed on, consistent with the remuneration of the owners on the one hand, and the interests of the public on the other. To encourage reduction below this rate is to court danger, and tempt to imposition. Less careful and skilful crews will have to be hired; less strong and durable materials employed in the construction of the boats and the machinery, if the money to be reimbursed to owners, is to fall short of the cost necessary to have a good boat with safe machinery and well manned. It were folly to expect sacrifices from owners when the public refuse to make any in their own behalf. We say therefore that all those who have the general good at heart, and who would obviate the recurrence of disasters, too often occasioned by the very causes which we have pointed out, should discountenance all steamboat competitions for low prices.

As to competition in speed or racing, that is fortunately forbidden by law, and all impositions should carefully be noted and reported by every conscientious man.

Rakeby, a Tale of the Civil Wars.—This new opera, which has been twice received with the most enthusiastic applause, by full and fashionable audiences, will be repeated on Tuesday evening next, together with a great variety of other entertainments, for the benefit of the author—our facetious and singularly-gifted correspondent C. As an evidence of the very high estimation entertained of the piece by the managers themselves we may cite the fact, that they have produced it in a style of splendor with which few dramas are presented to public notice. The scenery and dresses are entirely new, the music effective, and eminently successful.

THE HIGHLAND MINSTREL BOY.

COMPOSED BY J. BARNET.

ANDANTINO.

I hae wan-der'd mony a night in June, A-long the banks of Clyde, Be-neath a bright and bon-nie moon, Wi' Ma-ry at my side.

A sum-mer was she to mine ee, And to my heart a joy, And weel she loved to roam wi' me, Her high-land min-strel boy.

SECOND VERSE.
Oh! her presence could, on ev'ry star,
New brilliancy confer,
And I thought the flow'rs were sweeter far,

When they were seen with her:
Her brow was calm and sleeping sea,
Her glance was full of joy,
And oh! her heart was true to me,

Her highland minstrel boy.
Oh! her presence, &c.
THIRD VERSE.
I hae play'd to ladies fair and gay,

In mony a southern hall,
But there was one far-away,
A world above them all;
And now, tho' weary years have fled,

I think, wi' mournful joy,
Upon the time when Mary wed
Her highland minstrel boy.
I hae play'd, &c.

VARIETIES.

SONG.

She died in beauty!—like a rose
Blown from its parent stem;
She died in beauty!—like a pearl
Dropp'd from some diadem;
She died in beauty!—like a lay
Along a moonlit lake;
She died in beauty!—like a song
Of birds amid the brake.

She died in beauty!—like the snow
On flowers dissolved away;
She died in beauty!—like a star
Lost on the brow of day.
She lives in glory!—like night's gems
Set round the silver moon;
She lives in glory!—like the sun
Amid the blue of June!

"As brief as woman's love."—Shakespeare.

THIS is one of the few axioms which have grown into general use, without being strictly correct in their application. It conveys in fact a libel on the sex, wholly unworthy of their character. A few striking exceptions to the fervency and constant devotedness of "woman's love" may be found on record, and are doubtless within every man's experience; but test the firmness and the endurance of affection in woman, and they will be found to exceed the same passion in our sex to a very great extent. Speak, ye mothers, whose fond and attentive care has watched over the infancy of your offspring, whose untiring zeal has tended the helplessness of childhood, curbed the follies of youthful inexperience, and checked the exuberant recklessness of ripening manhood; who have seen with anguish your fondest hopes and wishes blasted in the bud, yet still have clung to the cherished object you have doted on, through the progressive steps of folly, perhaps of guilt, and when tainted and dishonoured by his vices, cast off by a frowning world, and bereft of every other support, has he not found a mother's heart unchanged still? A sister's love, is also lasting,

"Nor time nor circumstance," can chill this affection. Daughters, too, have been found, who would brave every peril, endure every scorn, rather than forsake their parents.

But shall this reflection on "woman's love" for a moment be indulged, while the sacred affection of a wife is the hallowed blessing which thousands can attest as being the most "sovereign man?" Who has not felt in the darkest hour of sorrow, the beaming rays of hope proceeding from the unchanged and deep-rooted affection of the partner of his woes, the soother of his cares? Let us not, then, adopt this fallacious axiom, but rather say "firm as woman's love."

EARLY IMPRESSIONS.—Every one must have found how difficult it is to eradicate early impressions, or to overcome prejudices acquired later in life. Our first impressions cling to us with a tenacity which no change of place nor situation can destroy. The home of our childhood, the friends and associations of our youthful days, form images in our remembrance which can never be wholly obliterated. The wanderer from his native country may in his adopted home meet new associations, and acquire more wealthy connexions, and a higher standing in society than he held in the land which gave him birth, still the humble dwelling in which he was reared, the partners of his early joys and sorrows, the habits he was accustomed to in youth, are all "green spots" in his reminiscences, continually watered from the fount of never-failing memory.

INTEGRITY.—Integrity of character comprises more than the mere punctual discharge of pecuniary engagements, or an honest dealing in our worldly transactions. There is a morale in this qualification which spreads itself over every action we perform, and regulates the whole man. The failings of humanity crouch before its sway, the passions of our nature are subdued by its presence, censoriousness, lying, littleness of mind, and duplicity are all subjected to its rule, while the baser passions cannot find a resting-place in that heart which is occupied by integrity.

This world cannot explain its own difficulties without the assistance of another.

THE PREMATURE WHITE HAT.

I met a man in Regent-street,
A daring man was he;
He had a hat upon his head
As white as white could be!
'Twas but the first of March!—Away
Three hundred yards I ran—
Then cast a retrospective glance
At the misguided man.

I thought it might be possible
To do so foul a deed,
Yet not commit the murd'rous acts
Of which too oft we read;
I thought he might have felt distress—
Have loved—and loved in vain—
And wore that pallid thing—to cool
The fever of his brain

Perchance he had no relative—
No confidential friend

To say when summer months begin,
And those of winter end;
Perchance he had a wife, who was
Unto his side a thorn,
And who had basely thrust him forth,
To brave decorum's storm!

But no—a smile was on his cheek!
He thought himself the thing!
And all unblushingly he wore
The garniture of spring!
'Twas evident the man could not
Distinguish wrong from right!
And cheerfully he walked along
Unseasonably white.

'Then unperceived I followed him,
Clandestinely I tried
To ascertain in what strange spot
So queer a man could hide:
Where he could pass his days and nights,
And breakfast, dine, and sup;
And where the peg could be, on which
He hung that white hat up!

He paused at White's—the white capot:
Made all the members stare!
He past the trav'lers' smoky club—
He had no footing there!
He stood a ballot once, (alas!
There sure was pique in that)
'Though they admit light-headed men,
They black-ball'd the white hat!

But on he went, self-satisfied,
And now and then he'd stop
And look into the looking-glass
That lines some trinket-shop;
And smilingly adjusted it!
'Twas that which made me vex—
"If this is borne," said I, "he'll wear
His nankeen trowsers next!"
The wretched being I at length
Compassionately stooped,
And used the most persuasive words
Entreaty could adopt:
I said his hat was premature—
I never left his side
Until he swore most solemnly
The white hat should be dyed.

GEORGE P. MORRIS, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

Published every Saturday, at the corner of Nassau and Ann streets.
Terms four dollars per annum, payable in advance.—No subscription received for a less period than one year.

NEW-YORK MIRROR,

AND LADIES' LITERARY GAZETTE.

VOLUME VII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 29, 1890.

NUMBER 47.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

REMEMBRANCES.

REMEMBERED sorrow! darkly art thou sending
The weary spirit to the pangs of past;
And feelings crushed, and shaded prospects blending
With hopes that smiled but to deceive at last.
The pang, the throb, the thrilling sense of pain,
Come in their former keenness back again.
Remembered gladness! seraph-like thou'rt flinging
Thy robe of light o'er the dark present hour,
Like the oasis of the desert, bringing
Thy far-seen beauty, with its fresh'ning power,
And still green loveliness the heart to bless
Though drooping 'neath its load of wretchedness.
Remembered harshness! from the friends we cherished,
Fain would we all its agony forget;
Alas! though many a pleasant thought has perished,
The bitterness of this will haunt us yet!
Unkindness from the loved—oh! what can wring
The heart with such a pang as this doth bring?
Remembered kindness! dear the recollection
Of each sweet proof is to the grateful heart!
The soothing, calm attentions of affection,
The sympathy that in our griefs took part;
The cordial pressure of the friendly hand,
The lip which smiled a welcome sweet and bland.
Remembered tenderness! the eye that brightened
With joy at our approach, the conscious cheek
Which with the sudden blush of gladness lightened,
The lips that faltered as they strove to speak,
Whose whispered tones of tenderness were dear
As music's mellowest breathings to the ear.
How sweet, though mournful, is the vivid vision
Which memory lingers o'er with fond regret!
But ah! how dark and chilling the transition
Which brings us back to all we would forget!
And forces us oft sadly to contrast
The darkened present with the cloudless past. THYRA.

TELL ME, GENTLE ZEPHYR.

Tell me, gentle zephyr! tell,
Roamer of the hill and dell,
Tell me if thou'st met a maid
Wand'ring through these bowers of shade.
She hath eyes like night in hue,
But with all its star-light too;
Cheeks where love and gladness bring
All the youth and bloom of spring,
And where summer's hand unclothes
Rays to ripen beauty's roses;
Ringlets that unloose their brightness
O'er her shoulders' dazzling whiteness,
Giving now and then a glance
Of its Phidean expense;
Lips so like a parted rose,
Where the glittering dew repose,
And love may banquet when he wills
On the nectar heaven distills;
Such a small, white, velvet ear,
'Twere a bliss to whisper there,
Fondly, timidly revealing
Some soft tale of secret feeling;
And a bosom rich as June,
Round and modest as the moon,
When she vainly would conceal
The moving magic with her veil.
These are certain signs for thee,
If thou see'st as I can see;
If thou feel'st as I can feel,
Half the passion, half the zeal;
Or one throb of that wild pain
Firing soul and racking brain,
Which the absence hours awake,
As bigots fire the martyr-stake;
Zephyr! thou wouldst lead me where
Lesbias' breath embalms the air.

Flown! the trait'rous zephyr's flown,
And again I walk alone.
Like that zephyr is the earth,
Hears and makes your grief his mirth;
Listens to your words of sorrow,
Keeps them for his laugh to-morrow.
Oh the world is false indeed,
Falsest still is friendship's creed;
Heart of weakness, chain of gold,
Are its haven and its hold.

Give me one of Lesbias' kisses,
Richer than all other blisses;
Wisdom's word or warrior's steel,
Poet's fire or patriot's zeal;
One life's safety-lamp may hold,
But her path is dull and cold;
One may fill your land with spoil,
One may sing your hours from toil;
And the patriot's hand may cast
Tyrant's bondage on the blast:
Still what are they? dark they seem
In the light of beauty's beam;
They for mortal path were given,
This to light the path to heaven.

Let me then my Lesbia seek,
Draw to mine her softer cheek;
In her eye so safely bright,
See my journey's beacon light;
And gladly meet my final doom,
If it shine above my tomb.

ALPHA.

TALES.

THE UMBRELLA FIEND.

When shall we two meet again?
In storm and tempest, hail and rain.

Few of my readers have forgotten the remarkable thunder-shower which took place in the summer of 1825. It had been a sultry day with very little air stirring. Towards evening a singular dark cloud came edging out of the west. It grew larger and blacker, and by degrees covered the whole horizon. For a space there was an unusual stillness in the air! suddenly, the rain poured in torrents. The drains and sewers were choked, and the flood rushed through the streets like a mill stream at the spring freshet.

I happened to be at the time in Market-square. The waters swept down Elm-street and Cornhill, bearing oyster-benches, market-women's stalls, and hand-carts. The cellar under the old three-cornered mansion was filled in an instant. So rapid was the inundation, that the occupants had to run for their lives, leaving behind all their money and papers.

As the people stood gazing at the scene, their attention was attracted in a singular manner. A person appeared crawling out of one of the cellar windows, like a huge wharf-rat, routed by a high tide. He was dressed in the fashion of the olden time, and seemed altogether to belong to another generation. There is something peculiarly impressive in the velvet breeches, taffety waistcoat, and broad-skirted coat of the ancients. His appearance was striking, and the crowd stared at him with wonder. The proprietors of the cellar were absolutely amazed. They had never seen his visage before.

For a moment the stranger stood shaking himself like a large water-dog, when one of the spectators addressed him with, "Where in the name of heaven did you come from?"

The old man gazed vacantly around at the question. It was repeated. He became puzzled. At length his eye fell on my umbrella, as I stood in the crowd, and advancing a few steps he inquired, "It rains fast; my friend, will you lend me your umbrella?"

I was stupefied at the request. To have granted it would have exposed me to the pelting of the storm. Lend my umbrella at such a time! I couldn't think of the thing.

The people marvelled greatly at the appearance of the man, and still more at his ill-timed request. At length an occupant of the cellar approached, and demanded in an authoritative tone how he got into his premises, and what he was doing there. The stranger turned to him with a bewildered look, and then replied as before, "Will you be charitable enough to lend me your umbrella? I am wet through and through!"

This remark drew our attention to his clothes, which, to every body's amazement, were perfectly dry. The rain which drenched every thing else seemed to have no power on his wonderful vestments.

The fact was appalling, but it explained every thing. There was but one personage who could stand such a storm without a wet skin. The people began to draw back. As they retreated, the old gentleman continued to call after them, in plaintive accents, "Will none of you lend me an umbrella? I shall be drowned in the rain."

Perceiving his cries unheeded, he turned down Ann-street, and slowly disappeared. But I observed he accosted every person he met, all of whom stopped and looked back at him until he was out of sight. I judged from their movements that he made some singular request, which they were not disposed to grant, but which excited their curiosity. Presently one of the persons came up.

"That is a strange man," said he.

"Why so?" I asked.

"Because he stopped me to beg I would lend him my umbrella. Could he think I would give it up to a man I never saw before, and trudge through the rain myself? Lend my umbrella? I wouldn't do it to my own father!"

I saw the man was in a passion, and did not prolong the conversation, and he passed on. I afterwards heard of the old man in almost every quarter of the town. Without being affected by the rain, he was continually seeking to borrow an umbrella. A few individuals, moved by his piteous supplications, granted his request; but, instead of making any use of the article, he carried it under his arm, and went on begging for more. Old Captain Coney, for many years commander of the Winnisimmet ferry-boat, met him in North-square with three umbrellas, and yet he had the assurance to ask for the captain's. The old tar was so affronted that he couldn't speak plain. For thirty-nine years he told me he had followed the seas, but never fell in with such a fresh water shark in his life.

Colonel Canteen, of the militia, was also stopped in the street as he proceeded to the place of parade, in full regimentals. The colonel drew his sword, and if the umbrella-fiend had not speedily retreated, it might have become a bloody business, as the colonel told me with his own mouth.

Deacon Daisy was accompanying the widow Whisper one rainy Sunday from church, and the umbrella-beggar had the impudence to follow them all the way, importuning the gentleman to give up his umbrella, and let the lady wade home in the shower.

But I will not multiply incidents. These transactions made a great talk, both in the market and down at the north end. A few persons on the Neck also talked about them; but the other parts of the town were too much occupied by business or pleasure to notice anything. How that old man came into that cellar unknown to the occupants, puzzled all. Why the rain did not soak his clothes as well as other people's was still more perplexing; but above all, was the question who he was, and what he did with the umbrellas? None of these could be satisfactorily explained, except by supposing old Father Long-legs had come down in that shower, and was swept into that cellar with other rubbish. People puzzled about it until their brains got entangled in an inextricable knot. If a man wants to become master of a subject, it is highly injurious to think upon it. Money-diggers seldom find gold!

After committing several depredations, the umbrella-beggar at length disappeared. I had now heard nothing of him for several months, when sitting in my shop one wet afternoon, who should suddenly pop in but the old gentleman himself.

"I come," said he, with a heavy sigh, "to borrow your umbrella," and his eye fell on it in a corner. "I will return it precisely in fifteen minutes."

Before I had time to object, he had seized it and departed. I flew to the door, and caught a glimpse of him striding down the street with the umbrella under his arm, although it rained profusely. This was not the worst; as night came on, I stepped into a neighbour's to beg the loan of his for the evening.

"I shall have to go home in the rain myself," was his peevish reply. "An old gentleman borrowed it for a few moments, and has not brought it back."

"No, nor never will," said another neighbour, who came in whilst he was speaking. "I think that rascal lives by borrowing umbrellas; they say he has been into every shop in the street."

"Yes," said another sufferer, who came in wet to the skin, "in this street and many other streets; there is not an umbrella to be had on all Long-wharf!"

The fact was incredible!

Some days afterwards I called on a celebrated manufacturer in Court-street, to get a new umbrella. Perceiving his assortment to be unusually small, I noticed the circumstance.

"Sir," said the dealer, "I have never had such a call for the article in my time. I have sold a hundred within a week. Pray how did you lose yours?"

"An old gentleman in snuff-colour borrowed it and forgot to bring it back."

"I thought so. This has been the story of nearly every purchaser within a fortnight. Who can the knave be?"

"That is what I should like to know. Some say it is a man employed by the dealers to put them in a way of getting off their stock. Others declare it is a speculator picking up the article. Others believe it is the devil himself. What is your opinion?"

"I incline to the latter suggestion, more by token, that the rogue came here and walked off with the best one in the shop whilst I was engaged."

"Your suspicion is certainly plausible. What the deuce can any other person want of so many umbrellas when he is as impervious to wet as an india-rubber over-shoe? Well, well, if he gets this one from me it shan't be without a struggle." And so I departed.

Not long afterwards I saw the old gentleman scouring through Washington-street in a smart shower. Every body that had an umbrella turned across the street as soon as they saw him coming. That same day he was seen driving down Hanover-street with an umbrella under his arm. It was an old fashioned one, with a ring in the end. He had wheeled it from an elderly lady, who valued it as her last tooth, under the pretence of holding it over her during her walk! Subsequently I beheld him at his vocation in the news room of a Sunday, at the theatre, and also in the auction rooms and taverns. The number of umbrellas borrowed must have been enormous. All classes of people suffered from his rapacity. After he could neither beg nor borrow he would steal. Frequenting every public walk, attending every place of popular resort, obtruding into every dwelling, assailing every traveller, his depredations were incredible. In vain the police strove to arrest him. He always appeared when least expected, secured his booty, and eluded their vigilance.

He had now been missing for several months, and people thought he would never return. Possessors of valuable umbrellas began again, like rats, to poke their cautious heads from their holes, but they were soon compelled to scamper back again, like the afore mentioned vermin at the sudden spring of a snap-trap.

One Giles Gaper, a noted watchman, was walking his midnight rounds, wrapt, as usual, in a kind of cat sleep. It was an awful night—the wind piped high in the air, and the rain fell in torrents. The lengthening row of lamps shone in the dark sky like a string of bright buttons on a morning garment. But Giles did not see them. His dreaming thoughts were gambolling far away. Up Washington-street he trudged with the unerring instinct of a sea-bird through mist. When nearly opposite the Old South Church, down came a drum, thundering on the pavements a few yards from his feet. If it had been a blow on the drum of his own ear it could not more have startled him. He jumped full six feet. Looking up with fearful expectation, the dreadful umbrella fiend met his view. The wretch had clambered to the top of the window of Mr. Lane, the umbrella seller's shop, and was tearing away the large umbrella which, with the fallen drum, constituted his professional emblem. Giles Gaper staggered back; he was bewildered. It seemed as if a great water-wheel was turning round in his head! He could not believe himself awake, and attempted to paw open his eyes, like a singed bear, with his fists. Just then a terrible gust of wind swept through the street; it took the umbrella fiend high into the air, and Giles caught a momentary glimpse of him aloft, sailing far away with the umbrella like a balloon!

Gaping Giles spread his shocking story through the whole town. It frightened every body out of their wits. The teeth of his brother watchmen chattered as they dozed in their boxes, the dram-drinker shook his shoes as he wended his solitary way from the ale house, the lamp-lighter's hand trembled as he trimmed his evening lamp, and he slid hastily down his lamp like a spider, the barber could hardly hold his brush to lather a customer—in fine, for a time nobody could talk of anything but the umbrella fiend, although to mention his name nearly frightened them to death. Still they talked and trembled! At length the thing settled away into forgetfulness, like a bubble on the surface of the stream. The umbrella fiend was never seen, and people grew certain that he had ceased to trouble this "distracted globe" and was busy at mischief elsewhere.

A few weeks ago I was walking up Washington-street in a drenching rain. In front of the Marlboro' Hotel stood an hourly coach on the point of starting. It was the famous coach which runs to Roxbury with the great red umbrella on its top. The driver was on the box and about drawing the reins, when a piercing cry was raised—"Stop the coach! stop! stop the coach!" Immediately turning the corner of Franklin-street, the hated appearance of the umbrella fiend burst on my view. He was pale and agitated and out of breath.

"The umbrella!" he cried, pointing to the one on the coach, "the umbrella! oh lend me the umbrella!" He rushed distracted and sinking to the wheels of the coach. "Oh lend me that umbrella!"

"I can't spare it," said the driver.
"Only for fifteen minutes—oh lend it—do lend the umbrella!"

"I can't," said the driver, "it is attached to the coach."
"You must! you shall!" returned the fiend. "I must have the umbrella."

"I tell you it is fastened to the coach," said the driver angrily.

"In mercy let me have the umbrella! I implore, I beseech you! Do not refuse me! I am an old man perishing in the rain! I insist on having the umbrella—I will have it."

"Drive on, coachman!" said a voice inside.

He cracked his whip, the horses sprang forward, away they dashed, and away sped the fiend in the rear, shouting constantly,

"Stop! stop the coach! lend me the umbrella—I will have it—stop!"—until they were out of sight.

Last Saturday, in coming from the south end, I met the Roxbury coach in a gallop with the red umbrella still on the top. "A race!" cried a boy in the street. It thundered past with terrifying speed, and close behind still followed the umbrella beggar, shouting as before, "oh lend me that umbrella!" The sound is still in my ears—the piercing cry—"oh lend!"

If people shake their heads at this story, they can still see the fiend chasing the Roxbury umbrella coach on a rainy day.

Boston Commentator.

LITERARY NOTICES.

POSTHUMOUS WORKS OF JUNIUS.

To which is prefixed an Inquiry respecting the Author; also, a Sketch of the life of John Horne Tooke.

A work, bearing the above title has lately been published in this city by G. & C. & H. Carvill, which we have just perused with great pleasure. The writings of Junius, contained in this volume, consist of his private letters to Mr. Woodfall, his printer; his confidential correspondence with John Wilkes, and a number of miscellaneous letters, under different signatures; all tending, more or less, to explain the causes of his severe attacks on members of the administration of the British government of that day.

About one hundred and forty pages of the work are appropriated to a sketch of the life of John Horne Tooke, which is full of incident and interest. No man in England in the last century, not in power, occupied so large a share of the public mind as Mr. Tooke. He was the prime mover and actor, at the risk of his liberty and life, in all measures of opposition to the arbitrary proceedings of government.

But what renders this volume peculiarly interesting is the satisfactory manner in which the compiler has settled the long disputed question respecting the author of Junius's Letters; which he has shown incontestably to be no other than this same John Horne Tooke.

Although other works written in England had before asserted the same fact, they do not appear to have fully convinced the public in general.

Mr. Philip Thicknesse published a volume in 1789, entitled "Junius Discovered," in which he attributes the letters to Mr. Tooke. This, we are informed by an English gentleman now in this city, was bought up and destroyed. Great pains had been taken to procure a copy of the work. Messrs. Carvill had written repeatedly to their correspondent for it, and various persons going to London had been engaged to search for it, both in the book-stores and stalls, but all to no purpose.

This circumstance, tending to confirm the statement of the above gentleman, induced a request to be made to him for a written communication, giving an account of the manner in which he obtained his information, which he complied with as follows:

"About the year 1793, in a large town in England a discussion took place respecting the author of Junius's Letters. The prevailing opinion of the party was in favour of Mr. Tooke, and the work of Philip Thicknesse on the subject was alluded to; upon which some of the gentlemen expressed a wish to obtain a copy of it, but were informed that it could not be procured, having been suppressed. That this was the fact, no one of the company doubted at the time, and being so, it is certainly a strong presumptive evidence that Mr. Thicknesse had named the real author."

Another work has been published in England, advocating the same side of the question, which is taken notice of in the Gentleman's Magazine for April, 1813, in a note by the editor, appended to an article attributing the letters to a Dr. James Wilmott, as follows:

"A pamphlet, by the Rev. J. B. Blackeway, of Shrewsbury, has just been published, professing to disclose the long-concealed secret of Junius's Letters. A correspondent, who has read it, speaks of it as a very elegant and satisfactory performance, which he thinks will set the question completely at rest, by proving that Junius was John Horne Tooke."

Had the compiler of the volume under consideration seen these two works, he would, no doubt, have been saved much trouble in the arduous investigation. It is, however, the more satisfactory, that a number of writers on this abstruse subject should have come to the same conclusion, without knowing the arguments made use of by either.

The acquirements and abilities of Mr. Tooke pre-eminently qualified him for the task of writing those letters, and his principles and character would naturally prompt him to the undertaking. There is, moreover, a chain of events connected with the history of Mr. Tooke so exactly coinciding with the circumstances and causes inducing many of the letters of Junius, as must convince every attentive reader that they can no otherwise be accounted for but upon the supposition of the identity of the two characters. The two first letters, with which Junius commences, under the signature of Poplicola, carry conclusive evidence that the writer must have been absent from England for at least four months previous to their date. Mr. Tooke had been travelling on the continent for nearly two years, and had arrived at Paris probably but a short time previously to the date of the first letter. Here he found Mr. Wilkes in exile and an outlaw, for causes which Mr. Tooke considered connected with the public interest; and in fact he deemed the conduct of the government towards him to be an outrage upon English liberty. It was natural, therefore, that he should espouse his cause.

Mr. Wilkes had published a severe attack upon Lord Chatham for the part he had taken against him, in a letter to the duke of Grafton, which had been replied to by a writer, under the signature of W. D., attributed to Sir William Draper. These were printed in the Public Advertiser, under date of December, 1766. Junius's second letter, which is in answer to W. D. is dated the twenty-eighth of May, 1767, addressed to the editor of the Public Advertiser, and commences as follows:

"Your correspondent C. D. [mistaking even the signature] professes to undeceive the public with respect to some reflections thrown out upon the earl of Chatham in Mr. Wilkes's letter to the duke of Grafton; without undertaking the defence of that gentleman's conduct or character, permit me to observe that he was the instrument, and a useful one to the party, therefore should not have been sacrificed by it. He served them, perhaps, with too much zeal; but such is the reward which the tools of faction usually receive, and in some measure deserve, when they are imprudent enough to hazard every thing in support of other men's ambition."

Here is a communication, evidently written under the influence of Mr. Wilkes, five months after the one to which it is an answer, and commences as though it were in reply to a correspondent of the day before. This can only be accounted for from the hurry in which the writer was at the time, which exactly meets the case of Mr. Tooke. He left Paris for England on the twenty-sixth of May, three days previously to the date affixed to the letter, which is the day of its appearance in the Public Advertiser, none of the communications of Junius to that paper bearing any date, as is fully proved by the work under consideration. This letter, therefore, was probably forwarded before Mr. Tooke departed from Paris. Mr. H. S. Woodfall, as well as the readers of the Public Advertiser, were, no doubt, confounded at this abrupt address, for the communication alluded to by Poplicola must have been forgotten. Mr. George Woodfall, who published this letter in 1812, in conjunction with the whole political works of Junius, takes no notice of this absurdity, for this plain reason, he knew the author of Junius, and feared to make any explanation or conjecture respecting this gross blunder, lest it might lead to a discovery.

The severe attack of Junius upon the duke of Bedford is shown to have arisen from motives of revenge for a personal insult offered to Mr. Tooke by the duke, at an election for choosing freemen of the borough of Bedford. No substantial cause of a political or public nature can be adduced to justify this attack.

The identity of Junius and Mr. Tooke is rendered extremely evident from the dispute between the latter and Mr. George Onslow. Junius in his private letters upon this occasion to his printer, Mr. Woodfall, shows great solicitude in his inquiries respecting the intentions of Onslow in regard to his threat of prosecuting for defamation; and when this threat was actually put in execution, and Mr. Tooke was cast, through, as he conceived, the partial conduct of Lord Mansfield, who presided at the trial, in his charge to the jury, &c. Junius issued a most bitter philippic against his lordship, in which he says, "When you invade the province of the jury in matters of libel, you in effect attack the liberty of the press, and with a single stroke wound two of your greatest enemies. In some instances you have succeeded, because jurymen are too often ignorant of their own rights, and too apt to be awed by the authority of a chief justice," which evidently alludes to the conduct of Lord Mansfield on the aforesaid trial.

Since there are so many circumstances tending to prove Mr. Tooke to be the author of those celebrated letters, it may be asked, how it happens that they have not been more generally attributed to him? To which it may be answered, that the cause originated in one of the most fortunate incidents, in this respect, that could have occurred to Mr. Tooke. Although this happened fortuitously, it was no doubt afterwards managed with a secondary view of screening himself from suspicion of being Junius.

Mr. Tooke (or rather John Horne, for he had not then assumed the name of Tooke) and Mr. John Wilkes were acting in concert against the administration of that day, and were both members of a society, established by the former, for the support of the Bill of Rights. A misunderstanding taking place caused a violent contest between them, which was carried on in the Public Advertiser. Mr. Wilkes, by means of the populace, with whom he was a great favourite, finally prevailed over Mr. Horne, and became elected high sheriff of London. He then in a letter to Mr. H. observed, "Whether you proceed, sir, to a thirteenth or a thirtieth letter is to me a matter of the most perfect indifference; you will no longer have me your correspondent." Mr. Horne addressed his thirteenth letter to Mr. Wilkes, dated July 10th, 1771; but being mortified at the result of his contest with the latter, was determined still further to expose his real character to the public; and, as a plausible pretext for so doing, he made apparently a severe attack on himself, under the signature of Junius, in a letter addressed to the duke of Grafton, July ninth, the day previous to the date of his last communication to Wilkes.

It was necessary that this attack should be high-seasoned, in order to appear to be in earnest, and in point, to admit of a positive and unequivocal answer. Accordingly, Junius charges Horne with "a new zeal in support of administration," and with "endeavours in the support of the ministerial nomination of sheriffs." Accuses him, also, of harbouring the "vindictive malice of a monk;" and says, "now let him go back to his cloister. The church is a proper retreat for him. In his principles he is already a bishop." And to cap the climax, he adds, "The mention of this man has moved me from my natural moderation."

To suppose that Junius, if he had been any other than John Horne, would have made use of this language, is preposterous. The gun is overloaded and bursts with the discharge. If Junius was not Horne, and if there was any man in England to whom he owed pre-eminent respect it was to the latter. They had fought bravely together against the government up to this time. Horne in the open field and Junius covertly. No misunderstanding had occurred between them; both despised John Wilkes, the ostensible cause of their quarrel, and had attacked him in the most violent manner.

These specific charges, however, enabled Horne to meet them fairly; and, utterly denying a "connection of any kind, directly or indirectly, with any courtier or ministerial man, or any of their adherents," or that he ever used any "endeavours in support of the ministerial nomination of sheriffs," he then calls upon Junius to prove his allegations. It is probable that the partisans of Wilkes had promulgated by insinuations the charges made by Junius, and therefore it became desirable to Mr. Horne to have them categorically stated that he might answer in like manner.

Junius, in reply, modifies his direct charge of Horne's supporting the ministerial candidates, to his neglect of rendering aid to Mr. Wilkes, which was notorious, and expected by Wilkes himself, three lists of candidates being canvassed for at that election. "To exclude Wilkes (says Junius) it was not necessary you should solicit votes for his opponents. We incline the balance as effectually by lessening the weight in one scale as by increasing it in the other."

By a strict examination of the whole correspondence of Junius and Horne it will appear evident that the object of it was to clear the character of Mr. H. from the aspersions thrown out against it, and to exhibit Wilkes to the public in his true colours, as an unprincipled demagogue; and it is very apparent that but one hand had any concern in the transaction.

The open rupture between Horne and Wilkes took place January 1771, although Mr. Horne accused his adversary with having made anonymous attacks upon him previously. The election for charter officers for the city of London occurred in the latter part of March following, and terminated in favour of the Wilkites. Mr. Horne, having lost the ascendancy among what were called whigs, and being of course, extremely odious to the court party, thus writes to Wilkes, May, 1771:

"But whatever may be the opinions of any persons concerning my conduct, I shall not alter it; their uninformed opinions affect me little; I know my own situation; I must ever remain a poor and a private man, and can never be a candidate for the favour or confidence of the public. The voice of the people is not the voice of God to me, though (in the fair meaning of the word people) I have never thought it wrong; but it is the voice within me that shall ever be the guide of my actions." And, in July, in a letter to Junius, he says, "In the infinite variety of business in which I have been concerned, where it is not so easy to be faultless, which of my actions can he arraign? To what danger has any man been exposed which I have not faced? Information, action, imprisonment, or death? What labour have I refused? What expense have I declined? What pleasure have I not renounced?"

In another letter to Junius he says, "Singular as my present situation is, it is neither painful, nor was it unforeseen. He is not fit for public business who does not, even at his entrance, prepare his mind for such an event. Health, fortune, tranquillity, and private connexions, I have sacrificed upon the altar of the public, and the only return I receive, because I will not concur to dupe and mislead a senseless multitude, is barely that they have not yet torn me in pieces."

Contrast the above with what Junius says in a letter to Horne:

"As for myself, it is no longer a question whether I shall mix with the throng and take a single share in the danger. Whenever Junius appears he must encounter a host of enemies. But is there no honourable way to serve the public without engaging in personal quarrels with insignificant individuals, or submitting to the drudgery of canvassing votes for an election? Is there no merit in dedicating my life to the information of my fellow subjects? What public question have I declined? What villain have I spared? Is there no labour in the composition of these letters?"

Here Junius accurately describes himself as John Horne; who having become unpopular with the two parties into which the nation was divided, could not appear to take a part in public affairs without encountering a host of enemies; and he compares his present occupation with what it had been when canvassing votes for Wilkes, contending with Onslow, &c. In a private letter to Wilkes, Junius says, "A man who honestly engages in a public cause must prepare himself for events which will at once demand his utmost patience, and rouse his warmest indignation. I feel myself, at this moment, in the very situation I describe; yet from the common enemy I expect nothing but hostilities against the people. It is the conduct of our friends that surprises and afflicts me."

But if any doubts could remain respecting the identity of Junius and Horne, they must be dispelled by the exordium of Junius's forty-fourth letter, dated April 22, 1771, addressed to the printer of the Public Advertiser. This introduction has not the least connexion or relation to the subject treated of in the letter, and appears to be lugged in merely with a view of explaining his situation and feelings at the time; which was very soon after the (to Mr. Horne) unfortunate termination of the city election. It is as follows:

"SIR—To write for profit without taxing the press, to write for fame and to be unknown, to support the intrigues of faction and to be disowned as a dangerous auxiliary by every party in the kingdom, are contradictions which the minister must reconcile before I forfeit my credit with the public. I may quit the service, but it would be absurd to suspect me of desertion. The reputation of these papers is an honourable pledge for my attachment to the people. To sacrifice a respected character, and to renounce the esteem of society, requires more than Mr. Wedderburne's resolution. But, in truth, sir, I have left no room for an accommodation with the piety of St. James's. My offences are not to be redeemed by recantation or repentance. On one side our warmest patriots would disclaim me as a burthen to their honest ambition, on the other, the vilest prostitution, if Junius could descend to it, would lose its natural merit and influence in the cabinet, and treachery be no longer a recommendation to the royal favour."

Junius had probably been accused of mercenary motives in writing, which explains the opening of his letter. With regard to Mr. Wedderburne, Mr. Woodfall observes that he had deserted the principles of whiggism, and had, a little before, received the appointments of solicitor general and cofferer to the queen. Junius, though illy treated by the whig party, in the person of John Horne, was determined not to follow his example. And, moreover, was sensible that it could be of no use for him to do so, on account of his great disrepute with the existing cabinet. He had gone such lengths against them that there was no room for retreating. But this could not apply to an anonymous writer except in the predicament of John Horne; and no other man in the kingdom could probably be pointed out whose situation would exactly meet the case but he. Mr. Horne had in a great measure sacrificed his character with both parties, and he had forfeited the esteem, by the part he had taken, of some of his best friends, family connexions, particularly that of his brother-in-law, Dr. De-mainbray, a man of considerable influence at court. The condition of Junius, therefore, as given by himself, accurately describes that of John Horne Tooke.

ENCYCLOPEDIA AMERICANA.

It is, or should be known to most readers that Messrs. Carey and Lea, in conjunction with the Carvills, have undertaken the publication, under this title, of a popular dictionary of arts, sciences, literature, history, &c. brought down to the present time. The work is formed on the basis of the great and popular German Conversations Lexicon, but is modified and improved with additions suited to the urgencies of the American reader. These additions are chiefly composed of biographical notices of our distinguished countrymen, and will be found generally interesting. The edition is beautifully executed, and from its cheapness and great value will deserve a place in every family library. The present volume commences with the articles "Catholic epistles," and ends with a notice of the life of "Cranmer." It contains six hundred and sixteen pages closely printed in double columns, and equals in important matter the preceding volumes.

LOCKHART'S HISTORY OF NAPOLEON.

The untiring press of the brothers Harper presented, during the last week, two new works to the public, of one of which, the title stands at the head of this notice. We have read it and do most heartily concur in the praises that have been lavished upon it by the English press. It is, in our opinion, decidedly the fairest, most correct, and best arranged biography of that extraordinary man that has yet been written; perhaps, also, it is as fair and honest as can be expected from any Englishman—any subject of that dominion which was so long and so inveterately hostile to him and his authority. The work of Sir Walter Scott is more elaborate, and perhaps more full, but it is too long for every day readers, and, with hesitation be it said, too strongly tinged with prejudice for impartial history. We anticipate an immense popularity for Mr. Lockhart's work, and a speedy sale of the first, second, and third editions. This work forms the fourth and fifth volumes of the Family Library, a collection which we have already taken an occasion to recommend to our readers, and of the value of which we are now more strongly confident than ever.

PUNCTUATION.—When Lord Timothy Dexter, of Newburyport, wrote his famous book, entitled "A Pickle for the knowing Ones," there happened to be many heresies, schisms, and false doctrines abroad in the land regarding punctuation; and as many diverse systems appeared for the location of commas, semicolons, periods, dashes, &c. as there were works published. To obviate this difficulty and to give every one an opportunity of suiting himself, his lordship left out all marks of punctuation from the body of his work, and at the end of the book had printed four or five pages of nothing but stops and pauses, with which he said the reader could pepper his dish as he chose.

A PEDAGOGUE'S FUN.—A youth, who had not long emerged from scholastic trammels, having been smitten with a pretty face, consulted his former preceptor whether he would advise him to conjugate? "No," replied the pedagogue, "I should say, by all means, decline."

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

THE RAMBLER.—NUMBER NINETEEN.

TOBACCO.

IN all countries, Christian, Mahomedan, Jewish and Pagan, some foolish abomination or other has, in the dark ages, sprung up amongst the people, no one knows how, and been perpetuated, no one knows why. It is not my intention to illustrate the art of spinning-out in writing, and impose upon the public by entering into minute details, and citing grave authorities from cyclopædias, to show how the followers of the Prophet first came to eat opium, the inhabitants of Cochin China wang-te, or any other parallel case, but confine myself closely to the subject more immediately under consideration—a subject which, it may be said, is in every man's mouth, and "comes home to the bosom and business of all."

It is strange what a strong propensity nature has implanted in the human species, from infancy to old age, to convey all sorts of substances into that orifice which serves as a port of entry for the stomach. Even the small weeping and wailing babe, no sooner grasps with its tiny and unsteady hand any thing eatable, than its cries are stilled, and it carries it instinctively to its mouth; while, beyond all question, a mother's most infallible recipe for assuaging the grief of the hardy urchins around her is a substantial slice of bread and butter. It is pleasant to note the sudden transition from grief, or rather mechanical crying, to joy, which takes place in a little fellow as soon as a pacifying piece of victuals is placed in his hand. How his face lightens up, and his bright eyes sparkle and glisten through the moisture which overflows them, while ever and anon the "big round tears" unconsciously leave his silken eyelashes, and

"Course one another down his innocent nose."

It is a pretty study for a painter. The capacities for eating possessed by young children at a tender age seem to be immense—many of the young rogues will continue stuffing from the rising to the going down of the sun, with a gusto calculated to excite the astonishment of an epicure and the horror of a valetudinarian. The swallowing capabilities of a man, however, are by no means so great, though his early objections to letting his jaw-bones remain in a quiescent state continue equally strong; he has, therefore, adopted various ways for indulging this propensity without danger to himself, and among these, masticating tobacco stands strikingly conspicuous in this section of the globe; nay, to such an extent is this carried, that not only are thousands of acres of fertile land devoted to the purpose of raising it, but ships are fitted out and sent across the wide ocean, and men, esteemed by statesmen and philosophers of an inferior order on account of their colour, are torn from their home and wives and children, in order to cultivate a weed for other men of another colour to put into their mouths and then take out again!

At the best, tobacco appears to be a very unodoriferous and anti-poetical substance. To rebut the latter charge it may be urged that Byron, the greatest poet of the age, was partial to it; but it must be remembered that Byron used it only as a medicine—an antidote to rotundity—in small round balls, in order to allay the pangs of hunger when his lordship chose to fast, in order to prevent his growing, like Falstaff, "out of all compass—out of all reasonable compass." No—tobacco is death to poetry and poetical associations wherever it comes in contact with them. Suppose you fancy for an instant, a fine clear Sabbath morn in some of the snug, sheltered villages on the Connecticut river, the bell from the simple spire summoning the hardy yeomanry, far and near, unto the house of prayer. Fancy a venerable man trudging along the narrow pathway that runs winding through the sweet-scented meadows which lie between his home and the spot consecrated to the service of his Maker, with his smiling happy family tripping gaily at his heels: he feels the benign influence of nature in the balmy air, and is glad, though he almost deems cheerfulness a sin at such a time, while the rising generation find their hearts leaping with frolic glee within them as the delicious southern breeze, laden with the merry music of birds and the breath of flowers comes sweeping over the bold hills and beautiful valleys of Connecticut. There is poetry, deep and pure, in such a sight. But suppose, for an instant, that the old man, or any of the male part of his progeny, "chew"—fagh! what a jar it gives the feelings to think of such a thing—it is like a discord in a strain of heavenly music, or a blot from a sign-painter's brush on one of Turner's rich, harmonious landscapes. It brings you at once from the poetry of life to the harsh prose—the scurvy reality—and you see nothing but an old farmer and his tobacco-munching sons lounging along, employed in transferring large quantities of that detestable weed from one side of their mouth to the other, and ever and anon staining the bright young grass and pretty wild-flowers with their impure squirts as they pass on their way. Horrible! I wonder if there is any truth in the story of the men at the eastward, who are too decorous to masticate in church, and too prudent to throw any thing away, using the tomb-stones which cover the bones of their ancestors as fitting places whereon to deposit portions of the Indian weed, from which the sweets are but half distilled; and then, after the psalm is sung, the sermon preached, and the prayer prayed, resuming the pleasing process of extraction. Be that as it may, certain it is that the stones nearest the church door, in many of their villages, have diverse stains, which no rain can wash away.

Much is said of the influence which females exercise in this country, but it is to be feared that it is over-rated. Powerful as may be their commands and entreaties, and strong as may be their charms, it is reasonable to suppose that the charms of tobacco are still stronger, or they would doubtless have banished it from civilized society long ere this. It is shocking to think of a delicate creature with lips "like two young rose-leaves torn," having them at any time come in contact with those attached to what out of courtesy is called the mouth of a man, but which, in reality, is nothing better than a damp tobacco-box. Yet there is much kissing going on in the world for all this.

It is curious what strange and childish notions will perpetuate an evil. Drinking, gambling, &c. are enticing in the first instance, but all agree that the use of tobacco is dreadfully disagreeable to the young beginner; but boys will imitate the actions of men, and unfortunately it is considered manly to swear, drink mint juleps, eat tobacco, and smoke cigars; and thousands of beardless, puny creatures are led away by the desire to appear older than they are. Poor children! Why do not their parents whip them and put them to bed early for doing such naughty, dirty tricks? Solomon says, "he that spareth the rod spoileth the child," and it would be better for themselves and offspring if the worthy inhabitants of this city would pay a little more respect to Solomon's sayings; though, alas, with what consistency can a man correct his son for the very abominations he himself indulges in? It must be left to that indefinite power of education which it is the fashion of the hour to set forth as a remedy for all disorders and irregularities. One thing is clear; so much exhortation must be highly injurious to half-grown boys, and many of them, with wasp waists and the mere outlines of a face, look as if the liquor they are so fond of extracting had mingled with the current of their young blood, and was the cause of their light tobacco-coloured complexions. When it is considered that for all the nuisances of which the use of this substance is productive, the only good arising from it is the effectual laying of the dust in the streets in summer, and thus saving the public funds by superseding the use of the corporation water-carts, it is to be hoped that men will learn to pause before they "put an enemy into their mouths to steal away their saliva." We are very sorry for Messrs. Lorillard, but, as small political editors with seventeen bad subscribers say—"our duty to the public imperatively commands us to speak out."

noxious qualities. This fact he made known to the celebrated Dr. Beddoes, who was then actively employed in endeavouring to establish an institution at Bristol for the relief of consumption, in which he intended experimentally to test the power of gas as applied to the cure of human diseases. Dr. Beddoes was so much pleased with the information, that after some preliminary correspondence he invited Davy, then under twenty, to join him, to which the latter consented, stipulating, however, that he should have the entire control of the laboratory, a privilege that was conceded to him by Dr. Beddoes.

At Bristol the young philosopher contracted an intimacy with many excellent individuals, whose friendship materially aided him in his further progress through life; from one of whom, Mr. Cottle, the poet, we learn that Sir Humphrey was a poet of no mean talents, being a large contributor to the Poetical Anthology, a work now discontinued.

His time at Bristol was indefatigably employed in the pursuit of his favourite science, and during this period he gave to the world the result of his labours in a work entitled "Researches, Chemical and Philosophical." This work introduced him to the notice of Count Rumford, whose influence shortly afterwards procured him the professor's chair in chemistry at the Royal Institution. From this period we find him in the very centre of scientific information, with ample facilities to extend his inquiries.

His first experiments in the Royal Institution had relation to the discoveries of the celebrated French chemist, M. Segurier, on the process of tanning and to the phenomena of galvanism. In 1802 he commenced a series of lectures on the practical utility of chemistry as applicable to the common uses and necessities of life. These lectures raised his reputation materially, and subsequently led to the delivery of the important courses he gave for three successive years before the board of agriculture.

In 1803, although he had not yet made those discoveries which have since spread his fame over the whole world, he was chosen a member of the Royal Society, and two years afterwards he was made a member of the Royal Irish Academy, in 1806 he became secretary to the Royal Society, and consequently was in correspondence with the most eminent chemists and literati of both hemispheres. During the same year he was appointed to deliver before the Royal Society the Bakerian lecture, at which time he communicated his grand discovery of the compound nature of the two fixed alkalies, potash and soda, which he found were formed of metallic bases in composition with oxygen; after which he demonstrated that oxymuriatic acid was not, as it had been supposed, a compound, but a simple substance, which he called chlorine.

The increased celebrity which Mr. Davy obtained by these discoveries may be inferred from the fact that he received, in 1810, the prize from the French Institute, although England and France then waged an inveterate war. Bonaparte also forwarded him a sum of money with the offer of free passports through the dominions under his control—a splendid instance of the supremacy of genius and of science.

In 1812 he was knighted by the Prince Regent, being the first individual on whom his royal highness had conferred that honour. A few days afterwards he married Mrs. Apreece, a widow lady of considerable fortune. In 1814 he was chosen vice-president of the Royal Society, and a corresponding member of the French Institute. The following year he made one of his most important and brilliant discoveries, the invention of the safety lamp.

In consequence of the innumerable accidents which arose from the explosion of fire damp in coal mines, a committee of gentlemen was formed at Sunderland for investigating the causes of these destructive disasters. At their particular request Sir Humphry Davy examined most of the large collieries in the north of England, to provide, if possible, a remedy. It was at one time thought that a new mode of ventilation might be adopted—this was, however, found impracticable. In the course of these experiments he was led to conclude that the object might be attained by a lamp of peculiar structure, and the celebrated safety lamp, after a short time, gave security to hundreds of labouring men, who, before its invention, were every instant subjected to the peril of an instant and frightful death.

The coal owners on the Tyne and Wear presented him with a magnificent service of plate on the occasion, estimated at the value of two thousand pounds sterling.

In 1817 Sir Humphrey was created a baronet, and elected an associate of the Royal Academy. During the two following years he travelled in Italy, where he analyzed the colours used by the ancients in painting. He also examined the manuscripts found in Herculaneum, for the unrolling of which he invented a process, which has been used with par-

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

PORTRAITS OF CELEBRATED CHARACTERS.

SIR HUMPHREY DAVY.

Late President of the Royal Society.

THE distinguished object of this memoir was born at Penzance in Cornwall, England, December 17, 1779; at the grammar schools of which place, and of Truro, he received the rudiments of his education, and gave early proofs of those powers which have since procured him an imperishable reputation in all quarters of the world.

Having originally intended to pursue the medical profession, he resided some time at Penzance with a surgeon of considerable eminence at that place, from whom he derived both intellectual and professional improvement. But intending to graduate at Edinburgh, he was articled at the age of fifteen to W. Borlase, a respectable surgeon at Penzance, under whose care he steadily pursued a methodical system of reading, until at the age of eighteen, he became familiar with every branch of study connected with his professional pursuits; but chemistry was the science that more particularly engrossed his attention, and the ardour of his pursuit was shortly rewarded by a discovery of importance. Having made several experiments on water-weeds, he ascertained that these plants rendered the air contained in water pure by the same agency that vegetables deprive atmospheric air of its tial success. On his return to England, the death of Sir Joseph Banks left the presidency of the Royal Society vacant, and Sir Humphrey was elected to fill that honourable station, by a majority of nearly two hundred votes.

He continued to discharge the duties of this high office until 1827, when increasing ill health obliged him to resign it, and again seek relief from the mild air of Italy. In his retirement he communicated the results of experiments on various electrical combinations, which were intended to prevent the corrosion and decay of copper used for lining the bottoms of ships; and he received, in return for his communication, the royal medal.

In May, 1829, this distinguished man was seized with a sudden and fatal attack of paralysis, at Geneva, which terminated in his death on the twenty-ninth of the same month. The highest respect which private friendship and public esteem can bestow upon the dead attended his remains. No man in Europe has done more for science, both morally as well as physically, than Sir Humphrey Davy; his genius and his learning were devoted to the interests of his fellow-men, and his last efforts were consecrated to the advancement of pure and rational religion, founded on a philosophical exposition of its truth. In the little work, Salmonia, which occupied his hours of sickness, are the following passages; and as coming from a man who had penetrated far into the arcana of science, they are alike worthy the attention of the sceptic and of the believer in revealed religion.

"In my opinion," says he, "profound minds are the most likely to think lightly of the resources of human reason; and it is the pert, superficial thinker, who is generally strongest in every kind of unbelief." And again—"I envy no quality of the mind or intellect in others; not genius, power, wit, or fancy; but if I could choose what would be most delightful, and I believe most useful to me, I should prefer a firm religious belief to every other blessing." H.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

LORD BYRON.

It has often been remarked that the greatness or worth of very few illustrious men has been foretold at the commencement of their career. Nay, it often occurs that their entire character is misunderstood even by those who are in the main the most competent judges. Of this fact a pointed instance occurred in the life of the noble bard whose name is prefixed to this article. A gifted and acute critic in the Edinburgh Review actually advised "the minor" to abandon poetry and devote his talents to other pursuits! How gratifying this admonition, with its accompanying censures of his earliest efforts in verse proved to Byron, may be seen in his immortal satire—"English Bards and Scotch Reviewers." The error of the Edinburgh censor was so far fortunate that it furnished a most happy opportunity for the development of latent powers which might have else slumbered or been even crippled by a fawning adulation. As a literary curiosity not familiar to many readers at the present day—indeed we doubt if the review has ever appeared in any of our lighter periodicals—we have extracted it bodily into this number.—Ed. N. Y. Mir.

Hours of Idleness: a series of Poems, Original and Translated. By George Gordon, Lord Byron, a Minor. 8vo. pp. 200.

The poetry of this young lord belongs to the class which neither gods nor men are said to permit. Indeed, we do not recollect to have seen a quantity of verse with so few deviations in either direction from that exact standard. His effusions are spread over a dead flat, and can no more get above or below the level than if they were so much stagnant water. As an extenuation of this offence, the noble author is peculiarly forward in pleading minority. We have it in the title page, and on the very back of the volume; it follows his name like a favourite part of his style. Much stress is laid upon it in the preface, and the poems are connected with this general statement of his case, by particular dates, substantiating the age at which each was written. Now, the law upon the point of minority we hold to be perfectly clear. It is a plea available only to the defendant; no plaintiff can offer it as a supplementary ground of action. Thus, if any suit could be brought against Lord Byron, for the purpose of compelling him to put into court a certain quantity of poetry, and if judgment were given against him, it is highly probable that an exception would be taken were he to deliver for poetry the contents of this volume. To this he might plead minority, but as he now makes voluntary tender of the article, he hath no right to sue, on that ground, for the price in good current praise, should the goods be unmarketable. This is our view of the law on the point, and we dare to say so will it be ruled. Perhaps, however, in reality, all that he tells us about his youth, is rather with a view to increase our wonder than to soften our censures. He possibly means to say, "see how a minor can write! This poem was actually composed by a young man of eighteen, and this by one of only sixteen!" But, alas! we all remember the poetry of Cowley at ten, and Pope at twelve; and so far from hearing, with any degree of surprise, that very poor verses were written by a youth from his leaving school to his leaving college, inclusive, we really believe this to be the most common of all occurrences; that it happens in the life of nine men in ten who are educated in England; and that the tenth man writes better verse than Lord Byron.

His other plea of privilege our author rather brings forward in order to waive it. He certainly, however, does allude frequently to his family and ancestors—sometimes in poetry, sometimes in notes; and while giving up his claim on the score of rank, he takes care to remember us of Dr. Johnson's saying, that when a nobleman appears as an author, his merit should be handsomely acknowledged. In truth, it is this consideration only that induces us to give Lord Byron's poems a place in our review, beside our desire to counsel him that he do forthwith abandon poetry, and turn his talents, which are considerable, and his opportunities, which are great, to better account.

With this view we must beg leave seriously to assure him, that the mere rhyming of the final syllable, even when accompanied by the presence of a certain number of feet; nay, although (which does not always happen) those feet should scan regularly, and have been all counted accurately upon the fingers—is not the whole art of poetry. We would entreat him to believe that a certain portion of liveliness, somewhat of fancy, is necessary to constitute a poem; and that a poem, in the present day, to be read, must contain at least one thought, either in a little degree different from the ideas of former writers, or differently expressed. We put it to his candour, whether there is any thing so deserving the name of poetry in verses like the following, written in 1806, and whether, if a youth of eighteen could say any thing so uninteresting to his ancestors, a youth of nineteen should publish it.

"Shades of heroes, farewell! your descendant, departing
From the seat of his ancestors, bids you adieu!
Abroad, or at home, your remembrance imparting
New courage, he'll think upon glory and you.

"Though a tear dim his eye at this sad separation,
'Tis nature, not fear, that excites his regret;
Far distant he goes with the same emulation;
The fame of his fathers he ne'er can forget.

"That fame and that memory still will he cherish,
He vows that he ne'er will disgrace your renown;
Like you will he live, or like you will he perish;
When decayed, may he mingle his dust with your own."

Now we positively do assert that there is nothing better than these stanzas in the whole compass of the noble minor's volume.

Lord Byron should also have a care of attempting what the greatest poets have done before him, for comparisons (as he must have had occasion to see at his writing master's) are odious. Gray's ode on Eton College should really have kept out the ten hobbling stanzas "on a distant view of the village and school of Harrow."

"Where fancy yet joys to retrace the resemblance
Of comrades, in friendship and mischief allied;
How welcome to me, your ne'er fading remembrance,
Which rests in the bosom, though hope is denied."

In like manner the exquisite lines of Mr. Rogers, "On a tear," might have warned the noble author off those premises, and spared us a whole dozen such stanzas as the following:

"Mild charity's glow,
To us mortals below,
Shows the soul from barbarity clear;
Compassion will melt,
Where this virtue is felt,
And its dew is diffused in a tear.

"The man doomed to sail,
With the blast of the gale,
Through billows Atlantic to steer,
As he bends o'er the wave,
Which may soon be his grave,
The green sparkles bright with a tear."

And so of instances in which former poets had failed. Thus, we do not think Lord Byron was made for translating, during his nonage, Adrian's Address to his Soul, when Pope succeeded so indifferently in the attempt. If our readers, however, are of another opinion, they may look at it.

"Ah! gentle, fleeting, wavering sprite,
Friend and associate of this clay!
To what unknown region borne,
Wilt thou now wing thy distant flight?
No more, with wonted humour gay,
But palid, cheerless, and forlorn."

However, be this as it may, we fear his translations and imitations are great favourites with Lord Byron. We have them of all kinds, from Anacreon to Ossian; and, viewing them as school exercises, they may pass. Only, why print them after they have had their day and served their turn? And why call the thing in page seventy-nine a translation, where two words (δύο λέξεις) of the original are expanded into four lines, and the other thing in page eighty-one, μικρονομία πρό ἰ εἰς, is rendered by means of six hobbling verses? As to his Ossianic poetry, we are not very good judges; being, in truth, so moderately skilled in that species of composition, that we should, in all probability, be criticising some bit of the genuine Macpherson itself, were we to express our opinion of Lord Byron's rhapsodies. If, then, the following beginning of a "Song of Bards," is by his lordship, we venture to object to it, as far as we can comprehend it. "What form rises on the roar of clouds, whose dark ghost gleams on the red stream of tempests? His voice rolls on the thunder: 'tis Orla, the brown chief of Othona. He was," &c. After detaining this "brown chief" some time, the bards conclude by giving him their advice to "raise his fair locks;" then to "spread them on the arch of the rainbow;" and "to smile through the tears of the storm." Of this kind of thing there are no less than nine pages; and we can so far venture an opinion in their favour, that they look very like Macpherson; and we are positive they are pretty nearly as stupid and tiresome.

It is a sort of privilege of poets to be egotists; but they should "use it as not abusing it;" and particularly one who piques himself (though indeed at the ripe age of nineteen) of being "an infant bard"—("The artless Helicon I boast is youth;") should either not know, or should seem not to know, so much about his own ancestry. Besides a poem above cited on the family seat of the Byrons, we have another of eleven pages, on the self-same subject, introduced with an apology, "he certainly had no intention of inserting it;" but really, "the particular request of some friends," &c. &c. It concludes with five stanzas on himself, "the last and youngest of a noble line." There is a good deal also about his maternal ancestors, in a poem on Lachin-y-gair, a mountain where he spent part of his youth, and might have learnt that piobach is not a bagpipe, any more than duet means a fiddle.

As the author has dedicated so large a part of his volume to immortalize his employments at school and college, we cannot possibly dismiss it without presenting the reader with a specimen of these ingenious effusions. In an ode with a Greek motto, called Granta, we have the following magnificent stanzas:

"There, in apartments small and damp,
The candidate for college prizes,
Sits poring by the midnight lamp,
Goes late to bed, yet early rises.

"Who reads false quantities in Seley,
Or puzzles o'er the deep triangle;
Deprived of many a wholesome meal,
In barbarous Latin doomed to wrangle.

"Renouncing every pleasing page,
From authors of historic use;
Preferring to the letter'd sage,
The square of the hypothenuse.

"Still harmless are these occupations,
That hurt none but the hapless student,
Compared with other recreations,
Which bring together the imprudent."

We are sorry to hear so had an account of the college psalmody as is contained in the following Attic stanzas.

"Our choir would scarcely be excused,
Even as a band of raw beginners;
All mercy now must be refused
To such a set of croaking sinners.

If David, when his toils were ended,
Had heard these blockheads sing before him,
To us his psalms had ne'er descended;
In furious mood, he would have torn 'em."

But whatever judgment may be passed on the poems of this noble minor, it seems we must take them as we find them, and be content; for they are the last we shall ever have from him. He is at best, he says, but an intruder into the grove of Parnassus; he never lived in a garret, like thoroughbred poets; and "though he once roved a careless mountaineer in the highlands of Scotland," he has not of late enjoyed this advantage. Moreover, he expects no profit from his publication; and whether it succeeds or not, "it is highly improbable, from his situation and pursuits hereafter," that he should again condescend to become an author. Therefore, let us take what we get and be thankful. What right have we poor devils to be nice? We are well off to have got so much from a man of this lord's station, who does not live in a garret, but "has the sway" of Newstead Abbey. Again, we say, let us be thankful; and, with honest Sancho, bid heaven bless the giver, nor look the gift horse in the mouth.

The three years' imprisonment to which the two Wakefields were sentenced, the one in Newgate, and the other in Lancaster castle, expired on the fourteenth of May.

THE METAPHYSICS OF MUSIC,
AND THEIR ACCORDANCE WITH MODERN PRACTICE.
IN THREE PARTS—PART THE SECOND.

We have heard many complaints of the modern rage for musical accompaniment. Men of more refined taste have joined Mr. Cobbett in vituperating that indiscriminating thirst for sound, which would send honest farmers' daughters "to make a villanous noise on the piano." But this is comparatively nothing to the extent to which musical education was carried during the reigns of Elizabeth and James. The class through which it was possible to extend it was, of course, at that period, much smaller than at present. But where it did form any part of education, and it did so of that of every gentleman, it seems to have been pushed to a great extreme. Few persons of a certain rank were then to be found who could not play, and with superior execution, on at least one instrument; and, where nature permitted, take a part in vocal compositions; the awkward and forced complexities of which certainly did not tend to diminish their difficulty, however they might detract from their real merit. This fever of harmonies had subsided in England, until the establishment of the Italian opera, and the celebrity of Handel, in some sort revived it. The quarrels of the furious partisans of Faustina and Cuzzoni, and the homage paid to Nicolini, and afterwards to Farinelli, are strong symptoms of what is called the revival of music in England. A great step, however, was gained. Throughout the musical world, melody, forgotten and despised so long, began again to be attended to. Corelli and others are known to have been so far sensible of the excellence of some of the old airs, both of their own and of other countries, as to have made them the ground-work of many of their sonatas. From about this period the national melodies of Italy, of Scotland, and of Ireland, may, it is said, be traced in the compositions of the best masters. Some of the most celebrated operatic songs now known have the same origin. And if a single instance may suffice, I may mention that the far-famed "Nel cor piu" is taken, almost note for note, from an old Sicilian ballad. The success of the opera was an acknowledgment that songs are essentially dramatic; and it is confessed, in words at least, that, to the finished musician, feeling and expression are as necessary as science.

If such be a tolerably correct sketch of the progress of this art; and if, as the course of events has seemed to indicate, the hypothesis of Rousseau be founded in truth, a key is afforded to the explanation of the many anomalies which music, in its modern practice, presents. That natural melody should be both neglected and depraved, appears to have been inevitable. The difficulties against which it has to struggle are immovable and overpowering. It is a most unequal conflict, to set Mr. Coleridge's "blind boy," with his "pipe of sycamore," be his "notes as strangely moving" as they will, against the crash of a whole orchestra. Expressive melody must ever be in danger of being overwhelmed by mere harmony; and they who essay to rescue her from the depths of thorough bass, must, like Hotspur, dare

"To dive unto the bottom of a sea
Where fathom-line did never touch the ground,
And pluck up drown'd melody by the locks."

It is a question whether one air, during the last hundred years, has been composed by a professed musician, with any direct and intentional reference to any principle in nature, upon which musical expression can be founded. Strong as the assertion may seem, the chances are, that he who embraces music as a profession, and goes through an elaborate musical education, is less likely than other men to produce a naturally expressive combination of sound. This is no paradox, whatever may be thought of it. The fact is, that the harmonists have exterminated the melodists, as the great misall thrush does the common mavis. The race of bards, half-poets, half-musicians, has disappeared, because it is next to impossible that such a being should continue to exist; nor, if he could, would he dare to bring forward one original composition.

Ranking amongst the profounder studies, constituting a lucrative branch of trade, and giving employment to thousands, harmony must go nigh to overturn melody, by its very weight and momentum, if by nothing else. It is all-pervading. Now, who does not know how difficult it is for the greatest poetical genius to free himself, in any considerable degree, of those common-places and idioms which long custom and eternal repetition of versifiers have made a habit almost as inevitable as a natural tendency. In music this is ten times worse. The common-place "musical phrases," as they are styled, which have spread themselves every where through the medium of the voluminous and endless compositions of science, have of necessity become almost a part of the nature of every one who is possessed of a musical ear. They fly abroad

"upon the wings of the wind," like the feathered seeds of the thistle or dandelion. There is no avoiding them. We hear them by day and by night; in the theatre, in the street, in the church, in the ball-room. Like Pharaoh's plagues, they follow us into our very chambers. The difficulty of original composition is thus increased a hundred-fold, and the most determined cultivator of simple, expressive melody, will find himself, at every step, sliding into some of the innumerable artificial turns or modulations with which constant custom has indelibly impressed his imagination. Should a composer of expressive airs, in a style similar to that of the old melodies, exist at this moment, he would be denied the very name of musician. He would be hooted at by nine out of ten, and for three or four different reasons. He would be told that his music required no execution; he would hear it called simple stuff, that a child might play or sing; he would be twitted with monotony of key; he would be reproached with not concluding upon the key-note, and with a score of other offences against rules of which he and nature knew nothing. He would be accused, as every musician who has dared to verge towards simplicity has been, of want of science. This was the fate of Piccini, of Pleyell, and of Shield. The constant craving for variety and for difficulty—the superior extent of the class of those who are affected by harmony only—and the consequent multiplicity of its professor's publications, exhibitions, and gains, must probably always give scientific music a preponderance. He can only be celebrated who either distinguishes himself in elaborate composition, or in the performance of almost impossibilities of vocal or instrumental execution.

That no alteration can take place in the present state of music, it would be presumption to say. That, since the invention of counterpoint, it has altered materially, though slowly, cannot be doubted. The advances, too, towards natural expression, however faint or sophisticated, are such as prove some recognition of that principle of poetical imitation which seems to be the foundation of musical expression. That much of modern practice is totally inconsistent, and at direct variance with that principle, is true. It may be difficult to imagine how it has happened that, admitting so much, the whole has not followed—but the fact is so.

If we look over a collection of modern music we shall find that, in the management of the time, the principle of natural imitation has been, upon the whole, adhered to. As in nature, grief expresses itself slowly, and joy rapidly; so in modern compositions, as well as in the old airs, the vivaces are played quickly, and the affettuosi more slowly. As in nature, we find that passion hurries particular words and tones, although the general effect is plaintive and slow, so in the old pathetic airs we find that semiquavers to the extent of two or four at once, are generally and judiciously used. In modern music the same principle seems to be decidedly admitted; but pushed by a love of novelty and of execution to an excess which, far o'erstepping the modesty of nature, of course totally mars the effect originally intended. To the exaggerations of the stage may be traced many of the corruptions of musical expression; and it seems to be probable, that the introduction of long hurried hubbubs of passages into airs essentially slow, has been too much encouraged by theatrical performances. Be this as it may, it would be an easy matter to point out a score or two of scientific adagios and largos which a person, unable to read music, and not having the real notes as written, and the divisions of the bars in his mind's eye, would never discover to be in essentially slow time. The only effect of such composition upon unlearned hearers is to surprise and confound them. As to touching the finer feelings, the thing is out of the question; indeed, the evident intention of the composer is to take advantage of the slowness of the time, in order to exhibit his own skill and that of the performer, in running through divisions and sub-divisions. In the management of piano and forte the same principle of imitation may be traced, however faintly. All natural "discourses" of passion are alternations of softness swelling into loudness, and loudness dying into softness, as the gusts of feeling rise and fall. In expressive pathetic airs the imitation is accordingly true to nature. But in modern compositions, especially of the "lengthy sort," though the practice remain, and in full force—the reason for it is gone. Ask a musician why such a forte and such a piano are marked, and he only answers you with some vague and indefinite appeal to taste or to precedent. He calls it "light and shade;" but what rule is there for the distribution of light and shade over a surface where no intelligible form, no natural picture, is delineated? We may indeed "marble" such a surface; and if the lights were shadowed and the shadows lightened—if the ffs were turned into pps, and the pps into fs, what difference could it make? It is easy to give emphasis to that which is destitute of meaning, just as a boy reading Latin "nonsense-verses" at school, applies to them the same intonations that he is taught to give to a line of Virgil. This is only a trick, however, to make that look something like sense, which in reality is devoid of it, and if the emphasis were reversed, it would do just as well. The most glaring instance, perhaps, of the united use and abuse of imitation in modern scientific musical expression, is the "shake." The shake is in reality a poetical heightening of that tremulous effect of the voice which is always produced, especially at the close of a sentence where the tone begins to drop, by intense feeling. In accordance with this law, in all music the shake is introduced towards the close of a passage, which usually descends. That natural shake is any thing but that which musicians call a perfect shake. It is a tremulous imperfect vibration, and not a violent and distinct oscillation between two tones, which is a matter of most difficult vocal acquirement. In nature it rarely occupies more time than would be required for a crotchet in a common-time andante movement. In modern compositions, however, it is no unusual thing for it to occupy a whole bar of four crotchets—nay, two such bars—and upon exaggerations like these composers pride themselves.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

THE MUTATIONS OF FASHION.

THE despotic and ever-changing laws of fashion have afforded themes for the moralist, and subjects of ridicule for the satirist, yet still the goddess holds her sway with even increased power; and daring indeed must be that individual who presumes to question her legitimate right to universal rule. Dress, manners, tastes, politics, laws, may even religion, are all subjected to her dominion, and vary in their respective features at her sovereign nod. What changes may be traced in these several particulars during the last century, both in Europe and America? Let us examine a modern fashionable party, with its expensive decorations, its profusion of ornaments, and crowds of elegantes; the squeezing, the crushing, the frivolity, and the display of the skipping modern quadrille or cotillon; contrast it with the description of the formal sober assemblages, where our grandmothers moved straight and erect, like the Chinese figures which decorated their mantel-pieces, rustling in flowered silks and satins, that needed no other support than their own solidity and richness to sustain them in a perpendicular position—with what majesty they floated through the grave minuet, with its interminable evolutions and continued courtseyings. The beaux also were an entirely different race from the gallants of modern times, although the dandies and "exquisites" of our period may be traced in the petit maitres and "jessamies" of those "by-gone days;" their privileges, likewise, were regulated by the same rigid ideas of decorum which fashion then prescribed for dress. To touch the tip of the favoured fair one's finger, or to indulge in the innocent flirtations of the fan, was the utmost liberty allowed the sexes during the period of early courtship, which on the male side might be compared to a regular siege, so many obstacles had he to encounter before the fortress capitulated. "But we have changed all these things;" and now, thanks to the freedom of modern manners, an unrestricted intercourse of the sexes enables the fair one to coquet without restraint, and the gay Lothario to urge his claims free and uncontrolled. While the distinctions of dress no longer mark the gradations of society, and it is now extremely difficult from mere externals to distinguish the mistress from the attendant, the lord from the lord's gentleman.

Eating and drinking, visiting and sleeping, have all undergone their several mutations. We dine when our forefathers supped, and hasten to the crowded assembly at the time our sober ancestors prepared to take their nightly rest. Etiquette and acts of courtesy vary in like manner; formality and stiffness are banished from good society, and a dashing freedom supplies their place. The folding of a letter and the form of a visiting card change almost monthly, and a want of knowledge in these particulars will infallibly ruin the most promising youth in town; while the tie of a neckcloth, the sit of a coat, or the form of a book, will at once serve either to ruin or raise the character of an aspirant in modern fashion.

Literature is not untainted by these ever-changing rules. The prosing essay is no longer read; the sentimental effusions to Delia, Amaryllis, or Celia, would not be glanced at—even by cook-maids. Sparkling anecdotes, or got-up articles in the most showy and seductive style, must supply the place of laboured disquisitions on morality; and the wild strains of Byron, and the brilliant morceaux of Moore, have driven the whole host of sentimentalists out of the field. Even novels have entirely altered their character and appearance. The fair devourer of these "time honoured" vehicles for amusement will now turn with loathing from the delicate distresses of some persecuted heroine, ingeniously carried through eight or nine volumes, until at length all ends in a happy marriage, and will only read your historical tale, or a work descriptive of manners and real life, dished up with piquant taste and fidelity of execution; while periodical miscellanies, if they wish to be supported, must adopt the customs of the times, and be as variable and as showy as are the mutations of modern fashion.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

SINCE our last notice a new opera, entitled "Rokeby, or a Tale of the Civil Wars," has been performed several times at this house. The piece, in the flowing phraseology of the play-bills, is styled a "grand romantic opera," which, in plain English, we have always found meant a collection of improbable impossibilities, where the most strange events occur amidst crotchets and quavers, and songs are sung in extremely unlikely situations. In fact, nature and common sense took leave of opera long ago, and we be to the unhappy man who attempts to bring about a re-union. The only pieces of this description in the English language which can in any way lay claim to the above qualities, are Gay's glorious satire and Sheridan's Duenna, neither of which is popular, but stand as beacons to warn future operatic writers against such unnatural coalitions. The French go a step beyond the English, and commit the most desperate musical outrages on probability with impunity. It is no uncommon case for their operatic heroes to have a small-sword pass through their body, and then sing a solo, and their heroines frequently terminate their mortal career while warbling an affettuoso passage. In a French opera, taken from Scott's Bride of Lammermoor, the death of Lucy Ashton is one of the queerest affairs that ever took place—even on the stage. In despair for the loss of her lover, the lady takes corrosive sublimate, or something of that kind, and instead of dying as other people do after swallowing such noxious substances, she commences singing; and here it is that the astonishing skill of the composer is shown. When the poison begins to work violently, she bursts into a bravura; as nature fails, she softens down to a more plaintive strain, and finally her woes and sufferings and a delicate cadenza are finished together, and her pure spirit takes its flight in an extreme flat seventh. Now this is making a "swan-like end," with a vengeance. The author of Rokeby has succeeded in bringing together a goodly number of unlikely, and consequently striking incidents: they are such as occur in the poem from which the piece is manufactured, it is true, but without the intermediate explanations which are there furnished, to give them coherence; but this is of little consequence—and when we state, which we safely can, that the scenery was beautiful and appropriate, the acting generally excellent, and the music not only delightful in itself but delightfully executed, it will be seen that it required an uncommon quantity of retrograde ability on the part of the dramatizer to spoil the piece, and we are happy to state, that in the opinion of the public he has only partially succeeded in doing so. Barry as Bertram was energetic and animated, and gave great effect to several alarmingly long speeches by his spirited declamation; while Placide and Hilson did their best for two comic characters, which are grafted upon the main stock. Mr. Jones, a clever vocalist, new to the boards of this theatre, had a very water-gruel part allotted to him, in which he did his best to injure the reputation of the author by enunciating the whole of his speeches in a loud and distinct manner; while Mr. Richings, on the contrary, had the good sense to partially conceal what was set down for him, by speaking in a gruff, stage-ruffianly, intoxicated tone of voice; he was dressed in red, and looked admirably ferocious. It rather surprised us to see Mrs. Sharpe give such interest to the trifling part of Matilda. This lady invariably looks well, and acts well, and, as a stock performer, is of very great value to the establishment. She is too good an actress to turn tragic star, which has become a very common and discreditable line of business. Mrs. Austin, as a light-hearted, coquettish damsel, looked provokingly pretty, and warbled with the sweetness and facility of a bird. The band played wholly together, were vigilantly prepared to cover any defect on the stage, and accompanied the singers in a beautifully subdued manner. The efficiency of the orchestra is most material to the success of operas, and yet its merits or demerits are invariably passed over in silence. We at one time thought this arose from the want of a writer competent to the task of pointing them out; but we should think this cannot now be the case, as there are one or two papers published in this city expressly devoted to musical subjects. What more can be said, except that the piece was what is technically termed exceedingly well got up. Castles blazed and battlements fell crashing to the ground just when the music hinted to them to do so, and soldiers and robbers were slain at the precise demi-semiquaver which gave most effect to their deaths. On the whole, the drama had every advantage that it was possible to call to its aid, and it is to this that its success is to be attributed. The author ought to be very thankful for his present fortunate escape, and see and write better plays for the time to come.

The following epilogue, written by one of our best native poets, was received on Tuesday evening, by a full and fashionable house, with the most rapturous applause. It was spoken with great point and effect.

EPILOGUE TO ROKEBY.

SPOKEN BY BARNES, PLACIDE, AND HILSON.

Barnes.—O, spare your hands—'tis useless, all this blarney, The play can't live, without a word from Barney: 'Tis like a patient—quacks to death may steam him, And he is damned, if science don't redeem him. Grappling with fate 'tis I alone can part 'em, Barney will save the piece, secundum artem.

Go on, that's right, your smiles are what I'm after, The best prescription is a roar of laughter; One hearty laugh, no matter how excited, May save a life when every hope is blighted.

'Tis true, Placide has got an epilogue, But 'taint the thing—it don't "go the whole hog;" So, while he's back there, spelling out each line, I'll give you an extrumpery of mine; Original throughout—no one has read it— So, if you have a tear, "prepare to shed it:"

A certain fair one—once, in days of yore— Caught a bad quinsy, and her throat was sore; She could not speak, nor swallow, chew, nor sup, She scarcely breathed—the doctors gave her up, Her weeping friends, in silence, breathed their sighs, And stood prepared to close her fading eyes! 'Twas at this awful crisis, mid the gloom, Her favourite monkey stole into the room; With doctor's formal air approached the bed, Seized hold her wrist, then gravely shook his head! The droll manoeuvre called a smile from death, And one convulsive laugh restored her breath; Broke her disorder, let the fair escape, Who owed her cure alone to Dr. Ape:

Dye take? or must I give your wits a jog?

Stay—here comes Harry with his epilogue.

Enter Placide speaking the epilogue.—"In ancient times, when plighted vows were broken—"

Barnes.—You're too late, Hal, the epilogue is spoken.

Placide.—Spoken! By whom?

Barnes.—By me.

Placide.—By you!

Barnes.—'Tis certain.

Placide.—Why, 'tisn't a minute since they dropt the curtain,

And my address a good half hour employs.

Barnes.—"I've done the deed—dixit thou not hear a noise?"

If you attempt, you'll find yourself mistaken;

I made them laugh—that saved the author's bacon.

Placide.—And who, pray, bade you show your monkey capers?

The sun requires no aid from farthing tapers— I saved the piece, sir.

Barnes.—You!

Placide.—My humble talents

Secured the thing's success and turned the balance,

Or, as Prince Rupert says—"alone I did it!"

It's true, I pledge my honour!

Enter Hilson, speaking.—Heaven forbid it!

To put so mean a trifle "up the spout!"

Placide.—Hilson, be quiet! I know what I'm about.

Hilson.—That tone, my boy, smacks sharply of the acid.

Barnes.—Placide, by name, but not exactly placid, You're somewhat wroth.

Placide.—I am, and shall be wroth.

I'll speak my speech!

Hilson.—Not if you love the author.

Since I have saved his opera, 'twere wrong,

To jeopardise it with a speech so long.

Placide.—You saved the opera!

Barnes.—You saved it!

Both.—You!

Hilson.—Yes, I myself alone—you know it's true;

I hit it on the head—but lest it fail,

Here's a short epilogue to clench the nail:

"When erst the muses, on Parnassus' top,

"In mazy dances—"

Barnes.—Prithee, Tommy, stop;

Throw poetry and physic to the dogs,

Nor bore our friends, here, with dull epilogues.

Hilson.—Agreed, old Barney! and to end disputes,

The readiest way to harmonize our flutes,

Is to admit—so be it understood,

To please our friends we've all done what we could.

If we have failed—

Placide.—Why then—

Barnes.—What then, Placide?

Placide.—They'll take "a good intention for the deed."

Hilson.—I'll answer for't—I know these generous folks,

They're always laughing at us, or our jokes;

But what of our young author? Jest's nor wit

Won't add a penny to his benefit.

Placide.—His benefit is safe.

Barnes.—What then of Rokeby?

Hilson.—Should that be damn'd, it would a serious joke be.

But see! there's mercy in each judge's eye—

The bard's acquitted!—Rokeby shall not die!

Placide.—Egad, their plaudits make old Drury shake.

Hilson.—It's just the thing!

Barnes.—I say—"there's no mistake!"

[Exit.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Water.—We chanced some time since to alight upon an old edition of Morse's Geography, published in 1788, and felt forthwith curious to know what was indited in those ancient days respecting this goodly city which we now inhabit. All that we encountered there we shall not now promulgate, wishing to retain certain very interesting items for future articles. With one fact stated we shall however acquaint the reader forthwith, and if it do not strike him with amazement it is no fault of ours. Among sundry deficiencies laid to the account of the city of New-York, one of the most prominent is the want of good pure water! so that forty-two years ago was this evil publicly felt, and made part of the history of the times; and strange to say, even now it exists in all its unmitigated force! Many changes have since taken place. The city has long since left its stockaded barrier in Wall-street, and gone a walking most furiously up-town, making sad havoc with the farms and domains of the Bayarda, the Delanceys, the Stuyvesants, and Lispenards. The old village of Greenwich, which was then stated to be three miles distant from New-York city, has now become an integral wedded part thereof. The ancient solid tenements of Rotterdam brick, with their gable ends, tiled roofs, and iron clamps, representing the Anno Domini, have all vanished, with the exception of a solitary one in Broad-street, of which too the remembrance will soon be lost, unless we transfer it bodily into a plate for the Mirror. We have now a splendid city-hall, which, by the way, appears to be growing loftier since it has been deserted by Justice. We have city-hotels too, and American hotels, and theatres too, and Tattermalls, and Caroussels, and Vauxhalls, and, in short, all the good things, or at least the good names which we can borrow from London and other similar Babels. But we have not as yet any good water—not even enough, in fact, of the indifferent to perform the necessary ablutions upon our streets, which resemble so many depositories of filth, and glad the watchful eye, and fill the newspaper themes of our envious neighbours. Did not his honour, the present mayor, at his inauguration, call the attention of the competent authorities to this subject, and were we not promised relief? And wherefore has it been withheld? We are wrong, perhaps, to indulge in badinage on this subject, because the wants of the people loudly call for the adoption of some efficient measures. It were well, therefore, for those gentlemen who love to sip laced tea in a certain marble palace, and drink champagne once a month on the banks of a noted bay, to look well to it. They have, it is true, a whole year yet before them, but it will have soon elapsed, and then their constituents—. Only give us pure and wholesome water, and drench and clean our streets, and we shall not end the sentence.

The Fulton box.—This is the name given to a box to be deposited, by the consent of the owners, on board of every steam-boat in the United States for the reception of a single cent from every passenger. The sum which may be accumulated by these simple and humble means will form no inconsiderable fund, and will be devoted to the laudable, the long and shamefully neglected object of giving support to the widow and heirs of the immortal Fulton. An indelible stain has already been left upon the escutcheon of the national legislature, and of the people of this state in particular by the cold-blooded indifference which has been so religiously and systematically maintained by them towards this object. Even at this late day the origin of this excellent scheme is to be traced not to New-York, a state which has more immediately and extensively profited by the invention of the steam-boat, but to Virginia, where a few spirited individuals have boldly and magnanimously stepped forward to adopt this dernier resort in behalf of the suffering offspring of genius, industry, and science. May their philanthropic views not be fated to encounter a galling and disgraceful disappointment.

THE MOUNTAIN BOY.

A POPULAR MELODY, COMPOSED BY W. TURNBULL.

ALLEGRETTO.

I am a mer-ry moun-tain boy, And when at eve I seek my home, There's n greet me ev'-ry step I come, For gay-est of the vil-lage throng, I'm with my mer-ry moun-tain lay I charm the cares of life a-way.

VARIETIES.

EXTRAORDINARY POWER OF WHISTLING.—MR. DOVASTON, the friend of the celebrated artist and engraver on wood, Thomas Bewick, in a biographical article published in the Magazine of Natural History, gives the following account of his extraordinary faculty for whistling. "As he sat at work, I enjoyed his more deliberate and sound conversation, accompanied by strains of his most extraordinary powers of whistling. His ear (as a musical feeling is called) was so delicately acute, and his inflexorial powers so nice and rapid, that he could run, in any direction or modulation, the diatonic or chromatic scale, and even split the quarter notes of the enharmonic; neither of which, however, did he understand scientifically, though so consummately elegant his execution; and his musical memory was so tenacious that he could whistle through the melodies of whole overtures; and these, he said, he could obtain, having once heard them from the orchestra of a play-house, or a holiday band, in both of which he took extreme delight. In proof of this I tried him to some extent, by flinging on his pianoforte several wild airs I had taken down from pipers in the Hebrides and Highlands, of difficult and intricate evolution, which he completely repeated the first time. Lest he might have heard these before, I farther sprinkled at him (without of their originality) several private imitations of various national melodies, which he not only whistled, but when sauntering with him amid the same, he would reproduce them with perfect fidelity."

The following remark ought to be every American patriot. "The very mention of disunion of these states is a public injury. It goes to unhinge the tone of the public mind. It makes men acquainted with the possibility of the thing, and once admitted into their breasts they will not contemplate it with that abhorrence in which it ought to be held by every true patriot."

EFFECT OF EARLY EDUCATION.—Lady Raffles, in her memoir of her husband, Sir Stamford Raffles, mentions the remarkable fact, "that two young tigers and a bear were for some time in the children's apartments, under the charge of their attendants, without being confined in cages; and it was rather a curious scene to see the children, the bear, the tigers, a blue-mountain bird, and a favourite cat, all playing together; the parrot's bill being the only object of awe to all the party."

A FAIR ANSWER.—The following is from the Boston Commentator:—In the trial of a case to-day a sweet son of Erin, upon the question whether one of the parties did write, or not, a certain instrument important to the case, or whether he could write, Pat honestly replied, "Whether he did right or wrong is for your honour to judge, but I have told you the truth, any how; right or wrong, I have not lied at all, at all."

A schoolmaster said of himself, "I am like a hone, I sharpen a number of blades, but I wear myself out in doing it."

Men must have public minds as well as salaries, or they will serve private ends at the public cost.

ORIGINAL ANECDOTES.—A nameless exquisite, of our city, at an evening party, a short time since, attempted to be witty. After playing off his jokes for some time, uninterruptedly, to his own apparent satisfaction and the no small annoyance of the company, a lamp, half-filled with oil, attracted our wits

NEW-YORK MIRROR,

AND LADIES' LITERARY GAZETTE.

VOLUME VII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 5, 1830.

NUMBER 48.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

CHANGES.

A FRESHNESS hath gone from the field and the fountain,
From the glade and the glen where I wandered so long;
Where the fancy of youth clothed in light the far mountain,
And the vale and the hill-side resounded with song.

From the meadow's sweet bosom the smile hath departed
Which to childhood's glad vision in beauty it wore;
And the sky, like the brow of a man broken-hearted,
Is darkened with clouds that have coloured it o'er.

And the gleams are all faded which garnished each vision—
When painting all nature in gladness, I strayed
Where the woods seemed to wave with a verdure elysian,
And the newness of Eden around me still played.

But the music hath died, whose full cadence had power
To pour o'er my pathway the spell of delight;
And the heart's autumn whirlwinds have blighted each flower,
Where fragrance and beauty were wont to unite.

Many friends are asleep on earth's desolate bosom
That thronged in affection about me of yore;
They have gone! like the spring-gifts of bud and of blossom,
They have gone, and their arms will enfold me no more.

And with them lie buried the innocent laughter,
The smile, and the kiss that were dear to me then—
Ere I knew the cold changes that soon followed after,
The hollow and heartless—the shadows of men.

The mysterious glow of the spirit hath faded
Which awoke in my breast the emotions of song;
The heart is unquiet, the brow is o'ershadowed
As the current of being sweeps turbid along.

But amidst all the changes that mark my existence,
As I look back in memory's dream on the past,
The gay future still stretches its measureless distance,
And hope's golden sunbeams around it are cast. EVERARD.

EVELEEN.

In the halls where the young smile of beauty is brightest,
And hearts are the fondest, and feet are the lightest,
And the eyes' sinless beams are as brilliantly tender
As the morn sun as yet unpossessed of its splendour;
And bosoms are beating with secrets unspoken,
And looks are a language, and sighs are a token,
There first she attracted my spirit's devotion,
As calm, yet as strong, as the zephyrless ocean.

Few, winningly few, were her smiles and her glances,
But oh! they were brighter and sharper than lances;
And the musical words, full of mildness and meekness,
Reflected the heaven which gave them such sweetness.
And I heard some dark spirit repeating "Alas!
"How soon will the dream of her innocence pass!"

I saw her go forth when the flowers were asleep,
With a figure more full and a bosom more deep;
And the lute of the minstrel was strung to her name,
But she blushed not to hear it so full of her fame.
Oh where were the roses which modestly nursed,
As a mother her infant, her sinless, her first?
And where were the looks that were born of the sky,
But more tenderly bright, and more brilliantly shy—
The looks that unconsciously claimed their dominion,
And plundered the soul of its heavenward pinion?
More fleeting and false than the dew of the morn,
That freshen at once and illumine the thorn,
Are the light of her eye and the beam of her heart,
And the empire of nature is yielded to art.
And again that dark spirit repeated, "Alas!
"How quick does the dream of her innocence pass!"

I saw her! alone and deserted she lay,
Her limbs' marble roundness was wasted away;
The breast which the slumber of angels may pillow,
Convulsively heaved like a wind-beaten billow;
The wing of the tempest dishevelled her hair,
And the fire of her eye was the hell of despair.
How sudden! how strange! Can the time-spirit speak
Its curse to the mind as it does to the cheek?
Is the temple of virtue alone undefiled,
While her ægis is borne by the hand of a child?
And as with the brow must it be with the mind,
And Eden with childhood be still left behind?
No—no! let me wander the universe round,
Be my circle of action undimmed as unbound.
Yea—yea, let eternity through his vast track,
But call for a moment his multitudes back,
And I trace all the innocence-wrecks I may see,
Man, boasted defender of beauty, to thee.
Too truly that spirit repeated, "Alas!
"How soon will the dream of her innocence pass!" ALPHA.

MIND.

"Happy the feeling, from the bosom thrown
In perfect shape, whose beauty time shall spare—
Through a breath made it, like a bubble blown
For summer pastime into wanton air!"

Should the soul pass neglected, when the brain
Girt in its narrow and unbreathing cell
May coin deep, burning words, which, through the air
Can lose their echo in a moment's space,
Yet, when in full recorded numbers poured,
If genius prompted them they may out live
The destinies of nations! Temples, thrones,
And cities, laden with the orient's spoil,
May sink in indistinctness and decay;
The worm may coil where once that busy brain
Evoked its images of lofty thought;
And the proud heart that stirred when they were wove,
Throbless and pulseless, in the dust may sleep;
The eye, which glanced with fervour spirit-born,
Lie veiled and dull beneath the unfeeling clod;
And yet, some stirring thought, aroused by stream
Or hurrying cloud in storm, or summer sky,
Or midnight's shadow, sunset, morn, or even,
Recorded, may outlive them all, and be
Upon the lips of millions yet untold—
Yea, generations yet to come may tell
Of one who breathed and lived in ages past,
Who, moved by dreams of inspiration's hour,
Wrote their deep sense into enduring life. W. G. C.

ORIGINAL MORAL TALES.

THE RIVAL MOTHERS.

IN TWO CHAPTERS.—CHAP. I.

EMULATION!—source of all that is bright and dark in our nature. In an honourable and virtuous heart, this principle leads to noble and generous deeds; but, harboured in a bosom sullied by evil passions, it is contaminated by the contact, and its spirit is changed. Emulation becomes jealousy, and rivalry degenerates into envy.

No feud between the rival houses of York and Lancaster, or Montague and Capulet, was ever productive of more malevolence or more domestic misery than that which existed between the humble but rival houses of Alleyn and Blakely. The female heads of these families were cousins, the only children of two sisters. They had been jealous of each other from their cradles. Their mothers each believed her infant eminently beautiful, each was persuaded that her own was far more deserving of admiration than its little cousin, and, eagerly wishing all the world to be of the same opinion, embraced every opportunity of exhibiting it to the best advantage. This feeling was natural enough, and not very blame-worthy if it had proceeded no farther, but it too often induced each vain mother, while pointing out the beauties and acquirements of her own child, to contrast with these the deficiencies of the other infant. "Is it not strange?" one was heard to say, "my Charlotte is only ten months old and walks quite well, while sister Helen's babe is a year old and cannot walk alone!"

While listening to the praises of her daughter's dark and glossy hair, Helen would congratulate herself that its hue was not red like her sister's little girl.

This constant comparison of their respective merits produced a strong effect on the children, and as it outlasted childhood, coloured all their future lives. As they grew up, their mutual relations and friends each selected a favourite, and supported her claims to admiration in all the discussions which continually occurred with regard to their beauty, and their proficiency in various studies and accomplishments.

The injudicious course thus pursued by their friends, soon produced its effects in the hearts of the two cousins. To emulation succeeded an eager rivalry. They were rivals in every thing. They both strove to win the heart of George Blakely, a young man possessed of wealth and distinction, who had just returned from making the tour of Europe. The dark haired Caroline was of a more gentle disposition than her cousin, and she loved George devotedly. Her affection was returned, and they were soon married. In the breast of Charlotte, ambition reigned above every other feeling; she envied Caroline more for the splendour which it was now in her power to enjoy, than for obtaining the heart of Blakely. Great was the triumph of Caroline's partisans that she had married before her cousin, and, of course, the mortification of Charlotte and her friends was proportionally great.

Charlotte's marriage became an object of their dearest wishes, but that desired event did not take place in many years, and the connexion she made did not by any means equal their ambitious expectations. She was united to Mr. Alleyn, a merchant of good standing, neither young nor wealthy. The income arising from his business was sufficient to allow him to live in a handsome, though moderate style. This ought to have satisfied his wife; and Charlotte would have been contented if the demon of envy had not perpetually brought to her remembrance the more splendid establishment over which her cousin Caroline presided. It became her most ardent wish to excel Mrs. Blakely, who was surrounded by all the luxury and splendour which the wealth of her husband could procure. To effect this object, Mrs. Alleyn gave balls and parties, and in order to outdash her cousin, purchased the richest dresses and the most expensive furniture. Mr. Alleyn frequently remonstrated with his wife on her extravagance; told her she was expending more than he could possibly afford, and tried to convince her that she could be as happy, although she did not live in such showy style as the Blakelys. But this was not his wife's opinion; there was no happiness for Charlotte unless she could excite the envy of her neighbours, and particularly that of her cousin, by the superior splendour of her establishment. To retrench her expenses, she said in reply to her husband's remonstrance, would be a mortification she certainly could not survive.

Mr. Alleyn did not love his wife so much as to ruin himself to gratify her whims, but after having been long in the habit of granting all her wishes, he found it a hard task to oppose them. He was, moreover, a weak man, one who had not strength of mind enough to do always what he knew to be right. He also enjoyed living in style as much as his wife, and had even been inspired by her with a desire to outvie the Blakelys.

To make his income meet his new expenses, Mr. Alleyn left nothing untried. He devoted himself more earnestly than ever to business, enduring a life of perfect slavery in order to render his wife more happy. As times became pressing, Mr. Alleyn took advantage of every occurrence in the mercantile world which he thought could better his condition; yet, in consequence of constantly living beyond his means, he was frequently on the brink of bankruptcy, from which he only saved himself by the greatest exertion, and it even began to be whispered by unfair means. Still, if Mr. Alleyn was known to go to the utmost length that mercantile honour is allowed to stretch, no one had actually detected him in any improper act. But his character, which had before been that of an honest, upright man, had suffered the blight of suspicion. And for what was this sacrifice made? that his selfish wife might have the means of indulging in every luxury, and of exciting the envy of her less opulent neighbours! Was the enjoyment of either promoted? No! anxious and restless, the wretchedness of both increased—a consequence which ever follows the indulgence of any unworthy sentiment in our bosoms.

Twenty-five years of care and weariness saw Mr. Alleyn anxiously toiling on. His family consisted of two sons and three daughters. Edmund, the eldest, was twenty-one. Unlike his parents, his heart was the residence of every virtuous and benevolent feeling. His character, however, was not of that unbending, decided kind which distinguished his brother Philip; he was gentle in disposition, and of a tender and affectionate nature. Devotedly attached to his parents, while his brother was roving the world in search of fortune and distinction, Edmund's only wish was to be near them and his sisters, that he might contribute all in his power to render their lives as happy as possible. His affectionate cares seemed lost upon his father. Mr. Alleyn had appeared for a long time uneasy and troubled, and at last a settled gloom seemed to have taken possession of him, which nothing could enliven. To the anxious inquiries of his family he always answered that, "his business worried him," so that the tender heart of his son was grieved to see distress ever before him which it was not in his power to alleviate.

Mr. Blakely's youngest child was a daughter of the same age as Edmund Alleyn. Cornelia was worthy of her Roman appellation in form as well as in character. She had a high and haughty soul, a supreme scorn of vice and folly, and a heart of manly firmness. Her manners did not generally appear amiable, but this was counterbalanced by the purity, fortitude, and disinterestedness which were the governing principles of her conduct. Cornelia Blakely was totally unlike Edmund Alleyn in every thing, and yet they loved, and had pledged their faith to each other. This measure did not meet the approbation of either house. The ill-will which had always been felt by the two cousins extended to their families, and a coolness sprung up which finally terminated all intercourse between them.

The mutual attachment of Cornelia and Edmund, circumstanced as they were, surprised all. But children of rival houses have from time immemorial given their hearts to each other, it would seem, precisely because it was the choice most obnoxious to their friends. No objection could be advanced to the lovers sufficiently reasonable to induce them to break their plighted faith. The mutual dislike of the two families was urged, and they well knew the extreme unwillingness both felt to form any closer ties. But their happiness, they contended, should not be sacrificed to such unworthy motives. An ungracious consent was at last wrung from their respective parents; the marriage day was appointed, and formal visits commenced between the rival powers.

Mrs. Alleyn, just before the wedding, was one day busily planning gay dresses and entertainments "to astonish the Blakelys," when her preparations were stopped by the declaration of her husband, that it was necessary for her to abandon all these magnificent ideas.

"The Blakelys," he said, "may incur what expense they please for the wedding, but I cannot afford a single entertainment, for I am on the verge of ruin; nothing but the strictest economy can keep my creditors in any sort of patience, and consequently my family from actual want."

This was a terrible blow to poor Mrs. Alleyn. She, however, recovered to protest,

"I will hear to no such mean-spirited proceedings. I have given invitations for a large ball and supper; two hundred acceptances have already been received; the refreshments and music have been ordered—how can I recede—what excuse can I give—what would the Blakelys say, my dear husband?" she continued; "you must keep up appearances a little longer. Do borrow of some of your friends. If we break now it will be so public; and think how the Blakelys will exult! Oh, I should die of mortification!—I am sure I should—you must let me give this ball, Mr. Alleyn."

"I tell you I have not a dollar in the world; and you know I cannot go in debt for these things as I have already such long bills at the confectioner's that they and the musicians have told our servants they will not serve us again until they are paid."

"As to giving up this ball," replied the wife, "I tell you it is utterly impossible; things have gone so far—and what would you have me send them word? That I am too poor to entertain them? Your son's marriage too! think, dear husband! our first wedding! oh, you must furnish the money."

To these, and equally reasonable arguments, urged over and over again, Mr. Alleyn listened in gloomy silence. At last, with a heavy sigh and an expression of agony, he rushed from the room, saying,

"Well, if you will have it, you shall, although ruin and shame follow!"

DEFERRED ARTICLES.

MRS. GARRICK.

We have heard that in the character of the late Mrs. Garrick there was a singular mixture of parsimony and liberality. She has been known to give fifty pounds at one time to the poor at Hampton, and on the instant deny herself the common comforts of life. Her wine cellar she did not open for years together, and a dish of tea was the usual extent of her hospitality. She always stated herself to be poor, as an apology for the ruinous condition in which the house and offices at Hampton remained. To save fuel and secure herself from damp, a room in the attic served "for parlour, for kitchen, and hall." She kept one female servant at Hampton, who resided with her many years; and to compensate the poor woman and a numerous family (for her wages were small indeed) the house and grounds were shown to visitors unknown to the old lady. The furniture of the house at Hampton was exactly as it was left by Garrick; and, except the curious old china and the paintings, worth very little. The chairs, sofas, and chandeliers in the drawing-room (the fashion of the times in which Garrick lived) were unworthy a common tavern of the present day. Notwithstanding Mrs. Garrick's constant complaint about her poverty, and the narrowness and inadequacy of her income, she left nearly seventy thousand pounds behind her. Mrs. Garrick's letter of remonstrance against Kean's Abel Druggier, was brief—"Dear sir: you don't know how to play Abel Druggier." His reply deserves also to be recorded, and placed to the credit of his gallantry—"Dear Madam: I know it." The following, in answer to the above statement, respecting the manners of the late Mrs. Garrick, shows the venerable lady in a very superior light, and will be read with much interest. It was addressed to the editor of a morning paper, and the writer, who signs himself Vindicator, says—"In justice to her memory, allow me to correct some of the errors into which the editor of the Dramatic Magazine and yourself, as his copyist, have no doubt unintentionally fallen. That Mrs. Garrick was liberal to the poor is admitted, but that she denied herself the comforts of life is not true; she best knew what her constitution required, and that she so managed as to retain her faculties unimpaired during nearly a century of years. It would be well for the world if all the men and women in it would follow the same sensible course. The house and offices at Hampton were not in the ruinous condition insinuated in the article in question; common repairs only were, at the decease of Mrs. Garrick, wanting, and they were made good under my direction, by order of the executors named in her will. Mrs. Garrick never, within my recollection, occupied a room in the attic, either 'for kitchen, for parlour, or for hall.' Upon the first floor was her bed-room, and in that she had a fire when she occasionally visited Hampton in the winter season, at which time her principal residence was in the Adelphi; at other times she occupied the best apartments, and not unfrequently in the company of her friends. That she usually kept but one female servant at Hampton, is true, but she also kept a gardener and undergardener there, and a coachman, footman, and two female servants in the Adelphi; as to the poor woman at Hampton, as she is called, having a numerous family and small wages, neither are true; Mrs. Garrick had great confidence in her, and left her by her will a legacy of one thousand pounds. With respect to the old furniture, such as Mrs. Garrick's veneration for it, and for every thing that had been her husband's, that she prized it beyond expression; in proof, I have in my possession four sheets of plain letter paper in an envelope, endorsed in the hand-writing of Mrs. Garrick—"These belonged to my husband." That Mrs. Garrick should not have looked so fascinating when Mr. Cruikshank caricatured her as when young, ought not to excite surprise; the portraits alluded to were probably drawn at about the age of twenty—the caricature when she had attained the age of ninety and nine years. That Mrs. Garrick should be delighted when promenading her picturesque grounds, in reciting events that had occurred in by-gone times, may well be believed—those grounds were formed by one whose memory she cherished with a devotion no language can describe. The sapplings which they planted were at her decease, indeed, noble trees; one of them, a cypress, which grew near to the house, she often pointed at as having been placed there by her hand, whilst her husband dressed the ground about it; that tree, singular as it may appear, never put forth a leaf after Mrs. Garrick died. Of part of that tree, and of the mulberry-tree planted by Shakspeare, of undoubted genuineness, I have in my possession two splendid boxes, having on their lids cameos of the immortal bard and the inimitable Garrick set in wreaths of gold, intended to be presented to our most gracious king by the trustees under Mrs. Garrick's will, as soon as the forms of the court of chancery will allow of its being done. It is not true that Mrs. Garrick complained of poverty in the way described, or that she left nearly seventy thousand pounds behind her, or even a tenth part of that sum. She was frugal, she was just, she was kind-hearted, and lived and died a pattern to wives, an ornament to her sex; and long will her memory be cherished by those who had the honour and happiness to know her."

CHARLES CARROLL.

This venerable representative of a former generation—now in the ninety-third year of his age, and which he has almost completed—is in the full enjoyment of most of the faculties which appertain to the meridian of life. During a recent journey to the south, the editor was fortunate enough to fall into the company of a respectable merchant at Baltimore, a friend of Mr. Carroll, by whom he was introduced to the "time-honoured" patriot. As we entered his parlour, Mr. Carroll rose to salute us with the customary compliments, and offered chairs, with almost as much ease and firmness as a man of fifty. His appearance indicated a high degree of health, which he affirmed he enjoyed without interruption. His under dress was of brown broadcloth, his waistcoat of the fashion of the last century. He wore no coat, but a gown of the same material as the waistcoat and small-clothes. His hair was of a silvery whiteness, his teeth apparently perfect, his eye animated and sparkling, though, as he stated, it had become too dim to enable him to read. His sense of hearing did not seem to be in the least degree impaired. He spoke with ease, articulated with uncommon distinctness, and his voice possessed all the clearness of vigorous manhood. He seemed to be pleased with his friend for having introduced a stranger, and to be delighted in answering all our interrogatories respecting the incidents and the individuals to which he had sustained an interesting relation in the earlier part of his life. He spoke often of Jefferson, Hancock, the Adamses, and other members of the congress of seventy-six; but he seemed to take especial delight in talking of Dr. Franklin, whom he described as one of the most pleasant and fascinating men he had ever known. He remarked that he and Franklin were commissioners to visit Canada, and endeavour to induce the inhabitants of that province to join the other colonies in declaring themselves independent of the mother country; and that the journey, though beset with difficulties and over bad roads, and sometimes through forests without any road, was rendered comparatively pleasant and agreeable by the wit and good humour of Dr. Franklin. He related many anecdotes of the doctor, illustrating these distinguishing traits in his character, and which made him a welcome and even a favourite companion in the politest circles of Paris. There was nothing in Mr. Carroll's manners or conversation that indicated the existence of that species of egotism which is usually the besetting infirmity of old age; and though he related in half an hour more anecdotes than we could write down in half a day, he was in no instance, that we recollect, the hero of his own story. His reminiscences were of the mighty dead, and his commendations were bestowed with unlimited generosity on his contemporaries who had gone before him to receive the "recompense of reward," and left him, as it were, "to speak their epitaph."

Mr. Carroll appeared to feel a lively interest in the ordinary topics of conversation—made several inquiries of his friend respecting political affairs, the prospect of business, and the progress of the Baltimore and Ohio rail-road; and asked of the editor many questions respecting Boston, its population, improvements, &c. He spoke more than once of the great inventions in machinery for saving labour, of the improvements in the mode of travelling, and expressed a regret that the family of Robert Fulton had not been fortunate enough to obtain a greater share of the benefits resulting from his improvements in the application of steam to navigation. He alluded several times to his great age—attributed that as well as his health to the regularity and temperance he had always observed in his mode of living—said that some people thought he would live to be an hundred years old—but added, with a smile, that it was not his desire to live so long, unless his mental and physical faculties could be retained, which he could not expect to remain much longer. When we rose to leave him, Mr. Carroll walked down the stairs with nearly as much elasticity of limb and firmness of step as either of his visitors.

Boston Courier.

NAPOLEON BONAPARTE.

When Bonaparte was paying his court to Madame de Beauharnais, says De Bourrienne, "neither of them kept a carriage, and he, being passionately in love, and a most assiduous suitor, escorted his intended about the town, and especially on her visits to her agent. They went one day together to the office of the notary Raguideau, who, by-the-by, was one of the smallest men I have ever seen. Madame de Beauharnais, who placed great confidence in Raguideau, had come to him that day expressly for the purpose of communicating her intention of accepting the hand of the young general of artillery, the protégé of Barras. Josephine was accordingly closeted along with the notary, while Bonaparte walked in the outer office, occupied by the clerks. The door of Raguideau's cabinet, however, not being shut close, the general overheard the lawyer dissuading Madame Beauharnais from the marriage she was about to contract. 'You are very imprudent,' said the notary; 'you may have to repent this step as long as you live; it is madness to go and marry a man who has nothing but his sword to depend on.' 'Bonaparte,' said Josephine, when she told me these prior circumstances, 'had never alluded to this, and I had no idea that he heard what Raguideau had said. Imagine my astonishment, then, Bourrienne, when on the day of the coronation, as soon as he had put on the imperial robes, he said, 'Go and find Raguideau, and bring him here immediately.' Raguideau soon made his appearance, and the emperor said to him, 'Well, and have I nothing now but my sword to depend on?' Eight years had elapsed since the scene at the office of the notary; and Bonaparte, although he had borne in mind the discourse of M. Raguideau, had never mentioned that he was privy to it to a single soul, not even to De Bourrienne at the time when he was in the habit of making his secretary the confidant and depository of all his projects and secrets."

De Bourrienne's Memoirs.

JOSEPH BONAPARTE.

This ex-monarch, who now leads a philosophical life on the banks of the Delaware, not far from Bordentown, was lately visited by Sir R. Kerr Porter, on his way from South America, by the United States, to Europe. The ci-devant king received with great hospitality the English traveller, who found him living in a commodious and even splendid dwelling-house, constructed out of a large suite of stables, which had formerly been appended to a magnificent mansion represented as quite a palace, which had been burnt down a short time before. Many fine pictures, and other valuable property, were consumed; but enough remained, saved from the fire, to furnish the present residence in a noble manner with some of the best works of Spanish and Flemish masters.

One of the saloons is particularly dedicated to sculpture portraits of the Bonaparte family; and Sir R. K. Porter, in speaking of the collection, describes the bust of Charles Bonaparte, the father of the family, as the most impressive of them all, from the striking beauty and character of countenance: it strongly resembles that of the celebrated Antinous. Joseph Bonaparte, (who has assumed the title of Count Survilliers,) in showing these things, did it with unaffected candour of comment on the extraordinary destinies of the living or dead originals of these marble portraits; and Sir Robert remarks, that the same manly sincerity and good sense prevailed in his occasional observations on his own past and present manner of life.

He has a large domain round his house, purchased by him; and he spends vast sums of money in promoting cultivation of all sorts, agriculture, and planting to a great extent every description of tree, even from foreign countries, that can be raised in the climate. He has redeemed thousands of acres from the waste; erecting villages, and encouraging artificers, and other persons of useful talents, to inhabit them. He is universally respected; and must be, what he seems, a much happier man in his present expatriated home, the benefactor of all around him—than he could possibly have been when seated on a contested throne, however brilliant.

He is fond of literary pursuits, and having read all that has been published in the shape of memoirs relating to his brother Napoleon, he devotes his leisure hours to writing a commentary on the subject, wherein with the impartiality of strict justice between the late emperor of France and historiographers, he means to set the true statements on the one side, and the false ones on the other, and to furnish posterity with, he trusts, a really fair account of that marvellous man. This, he says, he owes alike to the memory of his brother and to the verity of his history. Whenever such a work is given to the world it will certainly be worthy of attention, and as it tells of still exist, its accuracy must be subject to the same ordeal by which he tries his contemporary biographers; and the free voice of the public, weighing all the evidence, will be the ultimate pronouncing judge of the real character of the deceased Napoleon.

Foreign paper.

FOUNDLING OF NUREMBURG.

The Journal Hesperus states, that a clue has been discovered to the family of Caspar Hauser (the orphan of Nuremburg.) His mother is said to be a Hungarian countess, St. M——, at Pesth, who, as widow, enjoys the very considerable property, which, if there were a child, would belong to him. The first discovery is supposed to have been made by an ecclesiastic, who being at an inn, heard persons in an adjoining room speak of the affair. A waiting-maid, now in the service of Count P——, is stated to have implored him, on the reports of an impending investigation, to afford her his protection, "because this affair might bring her to the scaffold;" that he promised it her, but, notwithstanding, she had lost her senses through fear.

On the other hand, a Munich journal, the Bazaar, contains, in a private letter from Vienna, the following passages on this subject:—"Already, six months ago, I had the only possible and true conjecture respecting the birth of Caspar Hauser, and it is now fully confirmed. A few days since a governess in the house of Prince —, in Hungary, who at a former period was long in company of the great French general, was secretly arrested by legal authority. Accused of being cognizant of the birth of Caspar Hauser, perhaps even a relation, and also of the attempt to assassinate him, she pretended to be out of her mind. A physician discovered her trick by another stratagem. (The writer of the letter here enters into further details, which, however, must not yet be made public.) It appears that, in respect to Caspar Hauser, there has been no want of liberality in the purchase of daggers. The disclosure of the truth must, therefore, be attended with danger to my life if brought to light; a fact that might perhaps be felt like an electric shock throughout Europe."

London Sun.

FORESHORTENING.

Painters are not only careful to foreshorten correctly all the objects which they portray, but they often avail themselves of the principle to produce most striking effects. For instance, Martin, in many of his beautiful designs, by judicious foreshortening, has exhibited miles in extent of gorgeous architecture and of armed men, on a space of canvass that would seem scarcely more than sufficient to receive a few figures; he has made a single magnificent pillar or accoutred warrior placed in the foreground, become the type which first fills the mind with admiration, and then sends it along the retiring lines of beautiful perspective, where every tip or edge renews the first impression. A man lying on a table or a bed nearly as high as the eye, with his feet towards the spectator, is foreshortened into a roundish heap, of which the soles of the feet hide the greater part. This is the description of the painting which has been called the "Miraculous Entombment of Christ," and it is because an unreflecting spectator, moving sideways with the expectation of seeing more of the body, still sees only the soles of the feet, and may suppose the body turned round so as to front him, that the painting has received its appellation. For nearly the same reason the eyes of a common portrait may seem to follow a spectator to whatever part of the room he goes. A rifleman represented as taking aim directly in front of the picture, will seem to have in his power every spectator standing in the room; for, as in the case of the miraculous entombment, every spectator present will feel as if he alone could see the picture as all see it. To terrify young ladies, a little arch Cupid has ingeniously been represented with his arrow pointed directly at them, and just ready to let it slip from his bended bow; and oh, how they are terrified.

Arnott's Physics.

THE AUTHORESS.

We knocked at the door, which was opened by a tall, meagre, ragged figure, with a blue apron, indicating, else we might have doubted the feminine gender, a perfect model for the Copper Captain's tattered landlady, that deplorable exhibition of the fair sex, in the comedy of Rule a Wife. She, with a torpid voice, and hungry smile, desired us to walk in. The first object that presented itself was a dresser; clean, it must be confessed, and furnished with three or four coarse delf platters, and underneath a pipkin, and a black pitcher with a snip out of it. To the right we perceived and bowed to the mistress of the mansion, sitting on a maimed chair under the mantel-piece, by a fire merely sufficient to put us in mind of starving. On one hob sat a monkey, which, by way of welcome, chattered at our going in; on the other a tabby cat, of melancholy aspect! and at our author's feet on the founce of her dingy petticoat reclined a dog, almost a skeleton! he raised his shaggy head, and, eagerly staring with his bleared eyes, saluted us with a snarl. "Have done, Fidele, these are friends." The tone of her voice was not harsh; it had something in it humbled and disconsolate, a mingled effort of authority and pleasure. Poor soul! few were her visitors of that description; no wonder the creature barked! A magpie perched upon the top ring of her chair, not an unseemly ornament; and on her lap was placed a mutilated pair of bellows—the pipe was gone—an advantage in their present office; they served as a succedaneum for a writing-desk, on which lay displayed her hopes and treasure, the manuscript of her novel. Her inkstand was a broken tea-cup, the pen worn to the stump—she had but one. A rough deal-board, with three hobbling supporters, was brought for our convenience, on which, without further ceremony, we contrived to sit down and enter upon business. The work was read, remarks made, alterations agreed to, and thirty guineas demanded for the copy. The squalid hand-maiden, who had been an attentive listener, stretched forth her tawny length of neck, with an eye of anxious expectation. The bookseller offered five! The authoress did not appear hurt; disappointments had rendered her mind callous; however, some altercation ensued. This was the writer's first initiation into the mysteries of authorcraft; he seeing both parties pertinacious, at length interposed; and at his instance the wary haberdasher of literature doubled his first proposal, with this saving proviso, that his friend present would pay a moiety, and run one half the risk, which was agreed to. Thus matters were accommodated, seemingly to the satisfaction of all parties; the lady's original stipulation of fifty copies for herself being previously acceded to.

English paper.

SINGING CONDUCTIVE TO HEALTH.

Many parents in encouraging the development of musical talents in their children, have no other view than to add to the number of their accomplishments, and afford them a means of innocent solace and amusement. It was the opinion of Dr. Rush, however, that singing is to young ladies, who, by the customs of society, are debarred from many other kinds of salubrious exercise, not only to be cultivated as an accomplishment, but as a means of preserving health. He particularly insists that vocal music should never be neglected in the education of a young lady; and states, that besides its salutary operation in enabling her to soothe the cares of domestic life, and quiet sorrow by the united assistance of the sound and sentiment of a properly chosen song, it has a still more direct and important effect. "I here introduce a fact," remarks Dr. Rush, "which has been suggested to me by my profession, and that is, the exercise of the organs of the breast by singing, contributes very much to defend them from those diseases to which the climate and other causes expose them. The Germans are seldom afflicted with consumptions, nor have I ever known but one instance of spitting blood among them. This I believe is in part occasioned by the strength which their lungs acquire by exercising them frequently in vocal music, for this constitutes the essential branch of their education. The music-master of our academy has furnished me with an observation still more in favour of this opinion. He informed me that he had known several instances of persons who were strongly disposed to consumption who were restored to health by the exercise of their lungs in singing."

Ibid.

SIR THOMAS LAWRENCE AND MISS SIDDONS.

Sir Thomas Lawrence was, in early life, deeply enamoured of a daughter of Mrs. Siddons, whose fate has been a source of sorrow to him for years, even though his spirits have been buoyed up by the friendship of some of the most eminent and exalted personages in Europe. When he first proposed for Miss Siddons, some objection was made on the score of his want of wealth; but Mr. Siddons, with true liberality, said that, as he was a young man of powerful and rising talent, there could be little doubt that he would be able to support his daughter in a comfortable if not in a splendid style; and, as he was known to be in embarrassed circumstances, offered at the same time to relieve him of his incumbrances, and desired him to send him a clear estimate of his debts, that he might be enabled to commence a married life unfettered by the pressure of adverse circumstances. When Sir Thomas collected his bills, he found the amount far greater than he had himself believed; and not to shock his intended father-in-law by a sum total which would make his improvidence appear intolerable, he deducted five thousand pounds from the amount, little thinking that a discovery would be made of the concealment, and prove fatal to his hopes of happiness. It was, however, discovered, and Mr. Siddons, in anger, refused his consent to any further correspondence between him and his daughter. Sir Thomas was almost frantic at the fatal effects of his own folly, and did every thing in his power to retrieve his error. Miss Siddons was in a pitiable state, but as he had deceived her father respecting his embarrassments, said nothing; she bore the blow as quietly as her feelings would permit her. In a few months, her excited and agonized feelings brought on a severe attack of illness, for which the physicians ordered her to Bristol, where her recovery soon became hopeless. Blighted affection had reduced her to the verge of the tomb, and now her parents would willingly have given up all their property to have averted the dreadful blow which was soon likely to deprive them of a fondly loved child. Mr. Siddons offered to send for Sir Thomas Lawrence, and do every thing in his power to add to her comforts, but the poor heart-broken girl only replied, "No, it is too late now;" and she very shortly afterwards perished in the prime of life, the victim of thwarted love.

Ibid.

Those who are apt to take offence are the most likely to offer it.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

THE OCEAN.

"There is society where none intrudes
By the deep sea, and music in its roar."

I KNOW of nothing in the whole compass of Byron's varied productions which equals in sublimity of conception and vividness of colouring, his portraits of the ocean. Though, for the most part, the bold and masterly touches of genius are displayed in every thing which came from his hand, yet when his imagination fixes upon the "dark blue sea," he appears to surpass all other poets. As you muse over his immortal sketches in the hush of midnight and by the waning lamp, the wild note of the sea-bird and the low murmur of whispering waters and their silvery light—or the death-shriek of the drowning mariner and the roar of billows, together with the lurid and appalling wave-flash of the reflected lightning, break in upon the silence and dimness of your chamber. Time and space are annihilated by the magic of his numbers, and you feel yourself snatched away to the far-off sea, and regaled by its fresh cool breezes as you go bounding over its glorious expanse. He was emphatically the poet of the ocean, for the proudest march of his genius was upon its "mountain waves." He appears to have possessed a delight in its wild scenes amounting almost to a passionate fondness. In his boyhood, seated on some retired crag, he hung over it hour after hour of the still summer evenings, and felt in the excitement of his glowing fancy, a yearning towards it; and when in after years the ties which held him to his country were severed, he flew to its trackless solitudes as to a refuge and a home. Like a proud vessel which, after having been becalmed and ingloriously confined in some narrow bay, has gained the broad deep and the rushing gale, the indignant bard swept forth in the buoyancy of freedom, rejoicing as the breeze freshened, and exulting in the rudest commotion of the elements. At that stirring hour he could "laugh to flee away" even from the land of his fathers, for in the thrill of his emotions there was less of sadness than of joy. I can see him in imagination as he trode the deck, now soothing the sorrows of his little page, and now sweeping his deep-toned lyre as he poured his farewell to the receding shores, and a welcome to the waves that came dashing onward from the far stretch of the seaward horizon. The void in his heart, which no father's love and no mother's endearing tenderness had preoccupied with images of parental affection, and which had been widening from his boyhood by the death or estrangement of early associates, was now filled with the beauty and stirring majesty of the great deep. The loneliness that brooded like a dark spirit over his melancholy bosom was dispelled for a season by the strange grandeur of the prospects around him; and in the romance of poetical enthusiasm, he regarded the ocean as a living and intelligent existence. As he bent over the prow in the gentle moonlight, he discoursed with it as with a friend, and in its billowy commotions he gazed upon it with mingled reverence and joy. And who has not experienced such sensations, even when far away from the ocean, while his thoughts were hovering over its azure domains? I remember what a novel and indescribable feeling used to steal upon me when a boy, whenever I fell in with Virgil's description of the sea. I had never been beyond the mountain boundaries of my native valley—never enjoyed even a remote prospect of the sublime object of his inspiration, and therefore my young fancy was introduced in those passages to a fairy world, and left free to expatiate amid the glorious imagery of the Mantuan bard. After reading of Palinurus or the sweet-voiced sirens, I have gazed at the little lake which lies embosomed in the green hills near my father's cottage till my eyes grew dim, and its rippling surface seemed to stretch away to a misty and limitless expanse, whilst the sweep of the winds among the rough crags and pine forests of the neighbouring mountains uttered to my imagination the voice of the sounding deep. But how far short of reality, both in grandeur and beauty, did I find the conceptions of fancy when I beheld the object itself some years after. My first view of it was on a clear but gusty afternoon of autumn. The winds had been abroad for many hours, and as I looked seaward from the high promontory and beheld the long rough surges rushing towards me, and listened to their wild roar as they were flung back from the caverned battlements at my feet, I felt as if the pillars of the universe were shaken around me, and stood awed and abased before the majesty of excited nature. Since then I have been on lofty precipices while the thunder-cloud was bursting below me—have leaned over the trembling brink of Niagara, and walked within its awful chambers, but the thrill of that moment has never returned. The feeling of awe, however, gradually gave place to an intense but pleasing emotion, and I longed to spring away from the tame and trodden earth, to that wild mysterious world whose strange scenes broke so magnificently upon my vision. No wonder that our first roving impulses are towards the ocean. No wonder that the romantic and adventurous spirit of youth deems lightly of hardship and peril when aroused by its stirring presentations. There is something so winning in the multiplied superstitions of its hardy wanderers—something so fascinating in its calm beauty, and so animating in its stormy recklessness, that the ties of country and kindred sit looser at our hearts as curiosity whispers of its unseen wonders. In after years, when the bloom of existence has lost much of its brightness, when curiosity has become enervated, and the powers of the imagination palsied, where do we sooner turn to renew their former pleasing excitement than to our remembered haunts by the ocean? We leave behind us all the splendour and magnificence of art, all the voluptuous gratifications of society—we break from the banquet and the dance, and fly away to the solitary cliffs where the sea-bird hides her nest. There the cares, perplexities, and rude jostlings of opposing interests are for awhile forgotten. There the turmoil of human intercourse disquiets no longer. There the sweat and dust of the crowded city are dispelled as the cool sea-breeze comes gently athwart our feverish brow. In the exhilaration of the scene the blood gathers purer at the heart—its pulse-beat is softer, and we feel once more a newness of life amounting almost to a transport. Delightful remembrances, that lie buried up under the dross of the past, are reanimated, and the charm, the peace, and the freshness of life's morning innocence again find in our bosom a welcome and a home. The elastic spring of boyhood is in our step as we chase the receding wave along the white beach, or leap wildly into its glassy depths. In the low billowy murmur that steals out upon the ear, our ear catches the pleasant but long unheard music of other years like the remembered voice of a departed companion; and while leaning over some beetling crag, glorious visions pass thronging before our eyes, as, in fancy, we rove through the coral groves where the mermaids have their emerald bowers, or gaze at the hidden beauties, the uncoveted gems, and the glittering argosies that repose amid the stilly waters. The soul goes forth, as it were, to the hallowed and undefiled temples of nature to be purified of its earthly contaminations. She takes to herself wings and flies away to the "utmost parts of the sea," and even there she hears the voice of the Divinity, witnesses the manifestations of his power, experiences the kind guardianship of his presence, and returns cheered and invigorated to renew her weary pilgrimage. The ocean is a world by itself, presenting few analogies either in form or scenery with the continents it embraces. It seems to stand aloof from the dusty and beaten paths of human ambition in the dignity of conscious independence. Man may bring desolation upon the green earth, or dwarf its gigantic pinnacles to the stature of his grovelling conceptions, but over the beauty and majesty of ocean he has no power. He may mine the solid mountains, dig up buried cities upon which the lava has mouldered for centuries, and fix his habitation in their silent courts, but he cannot fathom the abysses of the deep, or walk the lonely streets of St. Ubes or Euphemia. He may visit the sepulchres of the first patriarchs, he may lift the caskets from the queens of the Ptolomies, but he cannot go down to the ocean grave of his yesterday's friend to close his eyes or cast the wild-flower upon his uncoffined bosom. I do not know whether we are capable of forming a true platonic attachment for an inanimate object, but I sometimes believe that we may. The shrine in which friendship has treasured up its cherished keepsakes, the ring that sparkled on the finger, and the ringlet that once shaded the brow of the departed—whatever, indeed, serves as a remembrancer of the absent, or a memento of the dead, speaks eloquently of the existence of such a passion. The home of our childhood has a spell of gladness for our hearts long after the beloved ones who formed its endearments have passed for ever from its portal. In the devotion of the idolator also there seems too much of reality to be the calculation of hypocrisy. The rivers, the hills, and the deep forests have their worshippers—the sun and moon listen to the hymn of the Gheber, who regards them with the expression of affection and reverence. With feelings akin to these, the astrologer gazes at the star, whose benignant influence, like an invisible guardian, has, in his belief, wrought out whatever there has been of happiness or prosperity in the unfolding of his destiny. Nor has the ocean lacked its admiring votaries. Byron, as I have before remarked, loved it with a poet's fondness. He rejoiced in the "colum undique, et undique pontus," a striking image of his far-reaching mind. The imaginative Shelley passed his brightest hours upon its waters, and at last found a welcome grave in their hidden bosom. I once heard a romantic story of a seaman whose attachment for the ocean was peculiarly striking. He became acquainted with it when young, and after having spent many years amidst its scenes, he ceased from his wanderings and returned to his native village. The remaining companions of his early days kindly welcomed him back, while his old fond mother clung tenderly and with tears to her rough but warm-hearted son. For awhile he forgot the delights of his wild roving in the pleasing associations which filled his mind, and in narrating to the listening villagers the wonders of the deep, and his own perilous, yet congenial adventures. At length he grew silent and evidently discontented, and the expression of delight passed from his bronzed and weather-beaten countenance. All perceived the change, and all strove to dispel his hidden despondency; yet still he continued melancholy and ill at ease. At last his mother, on entering his chamber one morning, found an affectionate farewell written on an old chart and directed to herself, with the collected earnings of his years of peril. But the endeared inmate had gone. He took his way back to the ocean and wandered from port to port, but broken down by age and hardship, he could find no employ among its adventures. With a heart aching from the dull monotony, the tame, listless quietude of the land, he retired to a small hamlet on the coast, and with the assistance of some kind fishermen built him a little bark. Once more he committed himself to the guidance of the rough elements, and once more the look of gladness settled on the hard features of the old sailor. Alone, but not solitary, he went forth upon the deep, and for many years after, the floating home of the ocean hermit was seen at all seasons in the Caribbean Archipelago. No one, not even the ruthless pirate, molested him in his quiet wanderings, but all greeted him with a hearty salutation, and all received a warm God-speed in return. During the day he sailed gently along the luxuriant islands of the tropics, singing some wild old ballad of the sea as he cast his fishing lines into its sparkling depths; and at night, after having filled his can from the fresh spring and laid in a supply of fruits, he moored his little vessel in some calm bay, and slept soundly as under the roof-tree of his mother's cottage. Time passed on, and severer infirmities began to steal upon his once vigorous frame, so that it was with difficulty he could now provide the common necessities of life. At length some soldiers seeing his boat in the vicinity of their fort, went down to the beach to welcome their old acquaintance. Slowly and irregularly it drifted ashore, when they found its debilitated possessor stretched insensible in his narrow cabin. They conveyed the famished man to their quarters, and used the best means in their power for his recovery. He was restored to reason, seemed grateful for their kind attentions, and for awhile appeared convalescent. One evening, however, after one of those tremendous hurricanes so common in those latitudes, the roar of the sea swelled up into his silent apartment and fell upon his ear. In the absence of the attendant he crept languidly from his couch and crawled to the terrace which overlooked a wide extent of ocean. The winds had died away—not a cloud blotted the bright azure of the horizon, and the moon and stars were looking peacefully down upon the troubled deep. Far as the eye could reach all was one wide awful commotion. The old mariner bent forward upon the parapet as if to spring away towards the scenes he loved so well. Before him, on the strand, lay the wreck of his little shallop, and a groan escaped him as he recognised its shattered form; but he knew that his wanderings were ended, and he sent his swimming glance far out upon the waters. And there they found him, his gray head resting on his shoulder, his withered arms thrown forth upon the wall, and his eyes fixed intently upon the deep; but his spirit had passed away in the transport of that fond lingering farewell gaze. PROTEVS.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

PORTRAITS OF CELEBRATED CHARACTERS.

SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH.

THIS distinguished and liberal-minded senator was born in the parish of Dorish, in the shire of Inverness, in 1765, and is descended from one of the most ancient clans in the north of Scotland. The father of Sir James was an officer in the British service, whose regiment was stationed for a considerable time at Gibraltar; in consequence of which the care of his eldest son, the subject of this memoir, was entrusted to the direction of a grandfather, until he arrived at the proper age for his admission into King's college, Aberdeen, where he remained the usual period, and from thence removed to Edinburgh, to study medicine.

In the Scottish capital he had opportunities of attending the lectures of the most celebrated professors of the day, from whose instructions he made a rapid proficiency in the knowledge necessary for the profession he purposed to adopt; but with the gay and volatile temperament of youth, he is described as entering unrestrainedly into the pleasures and dissipations which courted him on all sides. Notwithstanding his occasional lapse from propriety, he obtained the friendship of many distinguished men. Adam Smith, the famous author of the Wealth of Nations, was his friend and companion; and the earl of Buchan had so high an opinion of his merits, as to propose writing the life of Fletcher of Saltoun, the Scotch patriot, in conjunction with the young student. In 1787 he received his degree from the university as a doctor of physic, and immediately hastened to London, where, instead of following his profession, he commenced author, and sent forth to the world a pamphlet in favour of an unlimited and unfettered regency of the prince of Wales. The recovery of George the third having foiled the politicians who had embraced the side of the question the young doctor advocated, he of course suffered in the general defeat, and we find him shortly after this circumstance repairing to the continent to pursue his studies in medicine, from whence he returned to the British metropolis at the memorable epoch of the French revolution, and entered himself as a student of Lincoln's Inn. He was called to the bar by that society in 1792, and immediately began to practise as a counsellor.

In Edinburgh he had acquired the friendship and excited the admiration of the greatest wits of the time. In London he was no less fortunate; among others, he became the favoured protégé of Charles James Fox, and was unanimously selected by that distinguished statesman, and the illustrious circle of which Mr. Fox was the head, to encounter the celebrated Burke, whose "Reflections," &c. were then engrossing the attention of all classes of the community. Young Mackintosh immediately sent to press "The Vindica Gallica," written for the purpose of vindicating the admirers of the French revolution against the imputations and charges so unsparingly and so eloquently cast upon them by Burke. This work raised him in the estimation of his friends; and the temper with which he treated his venerable antagonist obtained from that great man the warmest respect, which subsequently led to an intimate acquaintance between the rival politicians.

The disastrous course of the revolution in France at length disgusted the fondest admirers of the dawn of that mighty change, which they had hailed with such satisfaction; and Mr. Mackintosh, leaving the active field of politics, in which he had so ardently engaged, now turned his attention to prepare a course of lectures on the law of nations, which he delivered in the hall of Lincoln's Inn. These lectures were attended with great success. Statesmen and politicians and lawyers, of all parties and grades, heard and admired them. From that period he took his station which he has since held at the head of the international lawyers of Europe.

In the year 1802, during the short peace of Amiens, a singular prosecution was undertaken in England, at the instigation of Buonaparte, then first consul of France, who had been libelled by a Frenchman resident in London, named Peltier. Mr. Percival, the English attorney-general, conducted the prosecution, and Mackintosh was retained by Peltier. In defending his client he gave expression to his indignant regret for the defeat of early hopes from the French revolution, for the flagrant outrages perpetrated by the rulers in their sanguinary career, and for the abused success and despotic character of Napoleon, with a force of eloquence which electrified the whole British empire. Soon after this he was nominated recorder of Bombay, an office which he discharged with satisfaction for ten years. He returned to England in 1812, and took his seat in parliament two years afterwards, for the county of Nairn. His maiden speech was delivered in behalf of the little republics and independent states which had formerly adorned the shores of the Adriatic, the Mediterranean, and the German ocean. His first great efforts in parliament were directed to a mitigation of the criminal code, a bequest left him by Sir Samuel Romilly. His eloquence proved eminently powerful and successful in this cause; and many revisions have since taken place, which may be traced to the indefatigable zeal of Sir James. The restrictions of the press have also claimed his attention, with all that force of argument for which he is so eminently distinguished. In short, wherever liberal principles are to be advocated, there this truly upright senator is conspicuous for his labours. The cause of South American independence found in him a warm and able advocate, and of catholic emancipation he was a firm and active supporter.

He is now engaged in writing a history of England, which is announced for republication in this country; and from the well known fitness he possesses for the task, much is expected from his powerful and energetic pen.

In person Sir James is dignified and commanding, and his action is graceful and manly. As an orator his delivery is described as being particularly forcible. His speeches are lessons of political wisdom, which his knowledge of the laws of nations and the principles of public liberty eminently fit him to expound; qualifications which have rendered his speeches among the most perfect that adorn the British senate. H*

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

THE RAMBLER.—NUMBER TWENTY.

NUISANCES NOT INDICTABLE AT LAW.

THE common law touching nuisances is too circumscribed—"cabin'd, cribb'd, confin'd" to the remedying of glaring and palpable annoyances—it protects a man against the intrusive location of lime-kilns, malt-houses, and gas manufactories—against braziers, blacksmiths, and butchers—against loud noises and offensive odours, but it leaves untouched thousands of apparently petty inconveniences which fritter away the vital powers and fret the spirit of an irritable person even unto temporary madness or inconsiderate suicide; as for instance, witness the case of the unfortunate gentleman in England, last summer, who, after perspiring profusely through the course of a long, scorching day, retired to rest at an inn, for the purpose of quieting his nerves by a refreshing slumber. Unluckily his intentions were frustrated by the assiduous attentions of a class of nightly visitors by no means peculiar to that country, who persisted in amusing themselves at his expense; the unhappy man, finding resistance was unavailing, swore to his companion that he would stand it no longer, and notified his intention of performing suicide; his friend laughed at this as a joke, but when the morning dawned, the poor flea-bitten victim of sensibility was discovered suspended from the bed-post, a martyr to the uncleanness of tavern-keepers' beds on the one hand, and morbid physical and mental feelings on the other.* Indeed there is no calculating the acute temperament of some people, for another gentleman drew a razor across his jugular vein, in consequence of having to wait five-and-twenty minutes for a beef-steak when he was hungry, and then finding, when he came to cut it, that it was cooked too much. The latter instance of the over-done beef-steak, was, to be sure, to speak precisely, rather an irreparable evil than a nuisance; but this does not affect my argument, which goes to show the extreme irritability of the nervous system in some persons, and the consequent slight contingencies on which the continuation of the co-partnership between soul and body depend. Upon these grounds I submit the following nuisances, for which an aggrieved spirit can obtain no redress, to the serious attention of the corporation, before the dog-days commence.

Nuisances not indictable at law.

No. 1.—Young ladies learning to play on the piano, and gentlemen the German flute. Both cases are susceptible of great aggravation, by the former requesting you to turn over the leaves of the music, and give your opinion of the successive executions as they take place; the latter calling your attention to their slow but steadily progressive improvement in their manner of going through the "Blue Bells of Scotland."

No. 2.—An author with a good opinion of himself, and a rejected manuscript tragedy in his pocket.

No. 3.—A person who is in the regular habit of entertaining you with anecdotes of his own life, from his childhood upwards, interspersed with episodes touching his particular friends.

No. 4.—A dyspeptic next you at dinner, who narrates his digestive difficulties for the three months last past; and gives his opinions at full on the merits of the different remedies for the efficacious removal of that very unromantic disorder.

No. 5.—Being asked for your own reminiscences and opinions on said subject.

No. 6.—The unavoidable society of a very young lady, whose conversation is limited to the announcement of a fact, and the hazarding a supposition, viz. that the weather is fine, but that it may change.

No. 7.—Sitting in the theatre during the performance of your favourite opera with a man attached to pea or pig-nuts in your immediate vicinity; the said man cracking a particularly hard-shelled one just as your ear is drinking in the delicious sounds which constitute one of Mrs. Austin's cadences.

* A fact. The above is the substance of the evidence adduced in the coroner's inquest. "What great effects from little causes spring."

No. 8.—Another man, on the other side, eating hard apples in a persevering and voracious manner.

No. 9.—Mr. C. in the character of Othello, and Miss F. as Letitia Hardy, with the Mermaid song.

No. 10.—Sitting on a shady bench on the Battery in a beautiful spring morning, delightfully, though unprofitably employed in creating glorious visions of happiness in the perspective, your mind totally abstracted from all around, when a man familiarly taps you on the shoulder, and civilly asks if you have "got any tobacco about you?"

No. 11.—The importunities of that silver-toned and pure-complexioned class of beings, named hackney-coachmen, when, in a fit of abstraction, you have incautiously wandered near their stands.

No. 12.—The conversation of a newly-elected officer of a uniform company.

No. 13.—Walking the streets of New-York in a windy day, and at every turn finding yourself enveloped in a cloud of lime, sand, and finely pulverized brick-dust, proceeding from the half-demolished or half-erected house of some speculating citizen. Just as you make your way out, with "tears in your eyes and curses on your lips," your mouth choked, your optics clouded, and your garments soiled and discoloured, meeting some fair friends, in whose sight you desire to appear amiable and fascinating.

No. 14.—Paragraphs in newspapers that commence as news and end as puffs, ward nominations, and lottery advertisements.

No. 15.—Speeches in the house of representatives, mint juleps, and buckwheat cakes.

No. 16.—Good advice.

No. 17.—Scrap-books, common-place-books, and albums. These are in the three degrees of comparison, positive, comparative, and superlative. Albums belonging to very pretty and very silly young ladies, in which nothing but originals are admitted, may be classed in the list of double-superlative nuisances.

No. 18.—Old friends with old coats, and symptoms of borrowing money or asking a favour visible in their physiognomy.

No. 19.—A poet, who thinks it unbecoming to talk common sense, or eat and drink like other people; who listens with a strange air of superciliousness and self-complacency to the ordinary chit-chat of mixed society, and ever and anon turns to catch your eye, and wink knowingly and contemptuously at the pleasant trifling conversation carried on, as much as to say, "We are above all this!"

No. 20.—An individual with two or three paint-pots in Broadway, on a fine day, the long stream of fashionables dividing on each side, like the waves of the Red sea, for the man of paint and putty to walk through.

No. 21.—A gentleman who is an ardent admirer of Counsellor Phillips's incomprehensible speeches, and is bent upon calling your attention to the beauties of the very fine and unintelligible metaphors with which they abound.

By the way, we recollect a story, which, as it is connected with the observance of a salutary rule, we may as well tell. Some time ago the newspapers made strenuous exertions to impress upon the people the necessity of "keeping to the right" in walking. This was a good regulation, though it might have been more effectually carried into execution if they had ordered them "to keep to the left," as they then could have availed themselves of the popular old distich, which does more towards enforcing this custom in Europe than any corporate enactments:

"The rule of the road is a paradox quite,
As you carry your body along;
If you keep to the left you're sure to go right,
If you keep to the right you go wrong."

There is nothing so difficult as a beginning, and many ultra-independent people determined on walking either to the right or left, just as they thought proper, consequently they frequently came in contact with those who wished to observe the rule, and there was much swearing, quarrelling, begging of pardons, and some slight symptoms of duelling. In fact, a walk from Canal-street to the Battery, keeping to the right all the way, in a summer afternoon, appeared to be impossible; and the first person who ever performed the feat was a fashionable young gentleman, who for a heavy wager disguised himself in "apparel vile," and with a paint pot in each hand, walked down with as little interruption as if he had been treading the streets of the "city of the dead." If we recollect aright, there was a poem published about it at the time, which is now as totally forgotten as Southey's epics: certainly the name and fame of the man who first "walked Broadway to the right" ought to descend to posterity.

More nuisances will be enumerated hereafter. Unfortunately it is a subject there is no chance of exhausting. C

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE METAPHYSICS OF MUSIC,

AND THEIR ACCORDANCE WITH MODERN PRACTICE.

IN THREE PARTS—PART THE THIRD.

So thoroughly forgotten are the natural reasons upon which these monstrosities have been originally built, that in treatises on musical composition they are not even attempted to be accounted for. The reader may look in vain for any intellectual explanation of the origin of piano and of forte, or of shakes or trills, or retardations, or pauses. He is taught by experience to expect the occurrence of such things in certain places, and after passages of a certain description—but why, he is not told, and he need not inquire. In the well-known book of Avison, the foundation of musical expression is hardly once attempted to be evolved, and for the detection of the very principle on which the treatise professes to hinge, we are referred—to nature? no—but to the scores of Geminiani, Crescimbini and Corelli! Mr. Ralph, in his pamphlet, does nearly the same thing. Dr. Burney at times seems to recognise the origin of expression in melody in the imitation of nature, but generally contradicts himself in the next page, floundering between the effects of melody and harmony; sometimes speaking of them as distinct things, and sometimes confounding them together.* Both in the practice and theory of vocal and instrumental performers, the same ignorance, or neglect, of any resort to nature for the explanation of melodious meaning, is exhibited. Scientific singing and playing constantly degenerate into a display of trickery. We are called to attend to exhibitions of the voice and hand, which have as little reference to natural intonation as the twirls of a high French ballet have to graceful motion. Of the indifference of most professional singers to the meaning of the airs they sing, their indifference to the quality of the words is a stubborn evidence. They will as soon attach doggerel trash to a favourite tune as the effusions of our best poets. A glaring instance of this is the stuff which Mr. Braham and others are content to tack to the melody of Robin Adair, although the best song writers which this country, or perhaps any other, ever produced—Burns and Moore—have written beautiful and appropriate songs to this very air. Foote, in his Commissary, has admirably ridiculed this piece of ill taste. Hear Dr. Catgut's account of the approved mode of writing a comic opera: "Last week, in a ramble to Dulwich, I made these rhymes into a duet for a new comic opera I have upon the stocks. Mind—for I look upon the words as a model for that kind of writing.

First sic.—"There to see the sluggish ass,
Thro' the meadows as we pass,
Eating up the farmer's grass,
Blythe and merry, by the mass,
As a little country lass."
Then he replies.—"Hear the farmer cry out zounds!
As he trudges through the grounds,
Yonder beast has broke my mounds;
If the parish has no pounds,
Kill, and give him to the hounds."

Then da capo, both join in repeating the last stanza; and this tacked to a tolerable tune will serve you for a couple of months—you observe." In the same spirit of ridicule Sir Richard Steele makes Trim, in his comedy of the Funeral, sing Champley's check for three hundred pounds; repeating, "hundred—hundred—hundred—because there are three hundred;" a better reason than can be given for most repetitions in music. With indifference to expression bad taste necessarily comes in. If we criticise the practice of musical people, we shall every where find that vagueness and inconsistency which always are the result of a want of reference to first principles. Thus a celebrated vocalist of the day, in that marvellously mawkish ballad, the "Bewildered Maid," gives the word "battle" with a furious accent—"in King Cambyse's vein," although the passage in which it occurs is one of melancholy and quiet narrative. I have heard a person of reputed musical refinement laud the setting of the words, "follow, follow," in the well-known Mermaid's song, "because the notes seemed to follow each other"—a brilliant musical illustration of oratorical action, so ingeniously applied to that famous line,

"The long—long—round—of ten revolving—years."

Nay, I have been told, on inquiring why a forte was to be followed by a piano in the repetition of the two dotted crotchets in "Fly not yet," that it was an echo! In Bombet's Lives of Haydn and Mozart, some notable specimens of musical criticism occur. The best, perhaps, is the chuckling self-satisfied way in which he favours us with the edifying anecdote of Mozart's composing the admired overture to Don Juan whilst drunk and sleepy. He absolutely hugs himself on the idea of having discovered, in the leading passage, a striking resemblance to the half-yawn half-snore which the nodding composer might be supposed to emit at intervals. Now what, in the name of common sense, has this to do with Don Juan? or in what way could it be a suitable overture to the exploits of that fiery hero, or, indeed, to those of any body else, unless the celebrated journal of Drunken Barnaby be dramatized and brought upon the stage?

If we inquire into the particulars of the admiration expressed for airs and songs in general, we continually discover either that the difficulty and trick of the execution, or the general smoothness and harmony of the accompaniments, are the sole grounds. They are taken for the excitement rather than for the meaning—pretty much as the Indian convert is said to have taken the sacrament, wishing "it had been brandy." Songs are often said to be good, when well sung; a qualification of praise which seems to mean, that the difficulty of getting through them is the real inducement for hearing any one make the attempt. With an expressive air, if the singer can give the meaning, it is nearly sufficient. In music, as in every thing else, even an involuntary exhibition of skill, which draws attention from the subject to the performer, is disadvantageous. In modern singing, however, this rule is reversed. Every convenient pause is occupied by a cadence, which is neither more nor less than a barefaced display of the talents of the performer. In the midst of the most pathetic appeal we are to break off and listen to the melodious vaulting of Madame or Signor. It is just as if Mr. Kean were to fill up the intervals of his by-play in tragedy by leaping through the back scene, because he can play Harlequin as well as Othello. Now all this goes to prove, that the gratification of what is often called musical taste, is, at bottom, that of mere curiosity; but it remains to be shown why curiosity is to be confounded with a feeling of the effects of music. Would they who flock to hear Catalani sing Rhode's violin variations, have felt the same pleasure in hearing them played upon a barrel-organ, or upon the violin even of Rhode himself? Certainly not. It was the difficulty of the attempt, then, that was the motive for listening; and curiosity was the passion to be gratified. We go to hear the human voice do what it never did before, for the same reason that we go to see human legs and arms do what they never did before. We admire him who runs highest upon the musical scale, upon precisely the same principle that we applaud the Indian jugglers twirling their balls, or Mr. Ireland leaping over a pole thirty feet high.

The observation may be fanciful; but it is an odd fact, that musicians, in the modern acceptance of the term, have failed in securing that respect and hold upon the imagination which the obscurer bards seem to have enjoyed. Shakespeare never brings them upon the stage but to ridicule them; and "a fiddler, a minikin scraper, a pum-pum!" are no unusual epithets with the older dramatists. It is remarkable, too, that of those to whom nature has allotted a share of sensibility above the common portion of mankind, very many have been known to prefer simple airs to more scientific compositions. Accustomed to delight in and to analyze the fluctuations and combinations of the passions, they have been delighted, above all others, with natural, and at the same time poetical intonation. Burns was so; so is Moore; so was Madame de Stael; so was Jackson of Exeter—at once author, painter, and musician. This last, indeed, drew upon him the wrath of the musical reviewers of his day, who accused him of attempting, in his Treatise, to include all good compositions in the class of mere "Elegies"—as they styled pathetic airs. Bonaparte had similar predilections; and was reproached by the irritable Cherubini with having no other idea of a serious opera than its being a succession of grave andante movements. The emperor, no doubt, was rather too domineering a critic. After telling the unfortunate composer that his most elaborate complications of semiquavers "had no meaning," he used to take the liberty of striking his pen through them, and insisting upon "sense."

"——— a hard
And hapless situation for a bard."

It was perhaps too much for human nature in any shape; but had Napoleon never played the tyrant elsewhere, the world would have had no great reason to complain. In pursuance of this train of reasoning, it is observable that the greatest composers have been men who, in general talent and intellectual qualifications, were below mediocrity; the conversation of Mozart was common-place; Haydn was an ordinary man; and Handel so decidedly dull, that even Dr. Burney, his admirer and eulogist, is constrained to admit it. Blackwood's Mag.

THE WIFE OF GOVERNOR HOUSTON.

The Nashville Banner of the seventh of May contains the annexed articles, introduced with these remarks:

"We regret the necessity of giving publicity to the following documents. We fear that, on the whole, no benefit will accrue to any party from the measure. But the number and high respectability of those who have promoted, aided, and sanctioned it, the prominent standing of the individual principally referred to, and the anxious expectations of the public, who are already aware that some movements have been lately made on the subject, leave us no alternative but to comply with the request of those who have transmitted us the article for publication. Where the lady spoken of is personally known we believe her reputation remains fair, and unsullied even by suspicion.

At a meeting of sundry respectable citizens of Sumner county, in the state of Tennessee, assembled at the court house in the town of Gallatin, on the twenty-sixth day of April, 1830, George Crocket of said town was called to the chair, and Thomas Anderson was appointed secretary.

The design of said meeting having been explained by appropriate remarks from Colonel Joseph G. Guild, on motion of Mr. William Howard Douglass, it was

Resolved—That the following gentlemen be appointed a committee to consider and draw up a report expressive of the opinions entertained of the private virtues of Mrs. Eliza H. Houston, and whether her amiable character has received an injury among those acquainted with her in consequence of the late unfortunate occurrence between her and her husband, General Samuel Houston, late governor of the state of Tennessee, to wit:

General William Hall, William L. Alexander, Esq. General Eastin Morris, Colonel Joseph C. Guild, Elijah Boddie, Esq. Colonel Daniel Montgomery, Thomas Anderson, Esq. Captain Alfred H. Douglass, Isaac Baker, Esq. Mr. Robert M. Boyers, Major Charles Watkins, and Joseph W. Baldrige, Esq.

And that said committee meet at the court-house in Gallatin, on Wednesday next, and report.

The meeting was then adjourned until Wednesday next, at ten o'clock.

Gallatin, Wednesday, April 28.

The citizens met according to adjournment, (all the members of the committee were present, except Colonel Montgomery,) and presented the following report:

The committee deem it unnecessary at this time to animadvert on the character and conduct of Governor Houston, except so far as they may be inseparably connected with the investigation and development of the character of his unfortunate wife.

It appears that very shortly after the marriage, Governor Houston became jealous of his wife, and mentioned the subject to one or two persons, apparently in confidence; yet the committee are not informed that he made any specific charges, only that he believed that she was incontinent and devoid of the affections which a wife ought to have towards her husband. The committee cannot doubt but that he rendered his wife unhappy by his unfounded jealousies, and his repeated suspicions of her coldness and want of attachment, and that she was constrained, by a sense of duty to herself and her family, to separate from her infatuated husband, and return to her parents, which she did early in the month of April last, since which time she has remained in a state of dejection and despondency.

The committee will close this report by observing that they are informed that Governor Houston had lately made a tour through the middle states, and had returned to Nashville on his way to Arkansas, where they understand he has located himself in the Cherokee nation; and it has been suggested that public sympathy has been much excited in his favour, and that a belief has obtained in many places abroad that he was married to an unworthy woman, and that she has been the cause of all his misfortunes, and his downfall as a man and a politician; whereas, nothing is farther from the fact; and without charging him with malignity of heart, or baseness of purpose, the committee have no hesitation in saying that he is a deluded man; that his suspicions were groundless, that his unfortunate wife is now and ever has been in the possession of a character unimpeachable; and that she is an innocent and injured woman, there is not the semblance of doubt.

The committee appointed to express the sentiments of this meeting in relation to the character of Mrs. Eliza H. Houston, and the causes which led to a separation from her husband, beg leave to present, that on the twenty-second day of January, 1829, General Samuel Houston, the then governor of Ten-

* In his account of the performances at Westminster Abbey, in commemoration of Haudel, he talks of the sublimity of effect produced by the multitude of voices and instruments, as if it were something peculiar to the music; forgetting that this kind of sublimity is common to all loud sounds, whether arising from shouting, from thunder, from the firing of cannon, the waves of the sea, or—Don Quixote's falling mule.

nesses, was married to Miss Eliza H. Allen, the daughter of Mr. John Allen, a highly respectable citizen of Sumner county. Miss Allen was born in the town of Gallatin, and has been reared in the county of Sumner, and is personally known to the whole of the committee, a majority of whom have known her from infancy. Up to the time of her marriage with Governor Houston no lady sustained (and the committee think justly sustained) a fairer and more unsullied reputation for all these virtues which embellish and adorn the female character.

The committee have had placed in their hands a letter from Governor Houston to Mr. Allen, written shortly after the separation, a copy of which they subjoin, without comment.

Ms. ALLEN—The most unpleasant and unhappy circumstance has just taken place in the family, and one that was entirely unnecessary at this time. Whatever had been my feeling or opinions in relation to Eliza at one period, I have been satisfied, and it is now unfit that anything should be adverted to. Eliza will do me the justice to say that she believes I was really unhappy. That I was satisfied and believed her virtuous, I had assured her on last night and this morning; this, however, should have prevented the facts ever coming to your knowledge and that of Mrs. Allen. I would not for millions that it had ever been known to you. But one human being knew any thing of it from me, and that was by Eliza's consent and wish. I would have perished first; and if mortal man had dared to charge my wife or say aught against her virtue, I would have slain him. That I have and do love Eliza, none can doubt; and that I have ever treated her with affection, she will admit; that she is the only earthly object dear to me, God will bear witness.

The only way that this matter can now be overcome will be for us all to meet as though it had never occurred, and this will keep the world, as it should ever be, ignorant that such thoughts ever were.

Eliza stands acquitted by me—I have received her as a virtuous and chaste wife, and as such I pray God I may ever regard her, and I trust I ever shall.

She was cold to me, and I thought did not love me; she owns that such was one cause of my unhappiness. You can judge how unhappy I was to think that I was united to a woman who did not love me. That time is now past, and my future happiness can only exist in the assurance, that Eliza and myself can be more happy, and that Mrs. Allen and you will forget the past, forgive all, and find your lost peace—and you may rest assured that nothing on my part shall be wanting to restore it. Let me know what is to be done.

Your most obedient, SAM. HOUSTON.

The report was unanimously accepted, and it was

Resolved—That the editors of the Gallatin Journal, Nashville Republican, National Banner, and all other editors who feel any interest for the character of an injured female, be requested to give the foregoing report and proceedings an insertion in their respective papers.

And the meeting adjourned. GEO. CROCKET, Chairman.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

The Mirror.—For the fact that the merits and character of the New-York Mirror have been steadily progressive, we refer to the past. Our arrangements for the future are far more advantageous than any we have hitherto been able to effect, and we therefore feel confidence in asserting that the eighth volume will be much superior, in every department, to its predecessors.

It gives us great pleasure to state, that this periodical will hereafter be enriched with original communications from the pens of

JOHN F. SCHROEDER, D.D.
FITZ-GREENE HALLECK,
CHARLES SPRAGUE,
WILLIAM LEUGETT,
JOHN INMAN,
PROSPER M. WETMORE,
JAMES LAWSON,
WILLIAM P. PALMER,
WILLIS G. CLARK,
SAMUEL WOODWORTH,
JAMES SHEA,
C. C. VAN ARSDALE,

GULIAN C. VERPLANCK,
ROBERT C. SANDS,
JAMES G. BROOKS,
THEODORE S. FAY,
WILLIAM COX.

MRS. EMMA EMBURY,
MRS. MARY E. BROOKS,
MRS. HARRIET MUZZY,
MISS ELIZABETH BOGART,
MISS SARAH AIKIN,
MISS A. WOODBRIDGE.

What we have done in the way of embellishments, is before the public; what we intend to do, we now submit to their notice. During the year, four fine engravings will be published. Subjects as follows:

I.—Street view in New-York, embracing Park Row, the Park, a portion of Chatham-street, the Brick Meeting, &c. with all the life and bustle incident to that part of the town.

II.—A view of the Bay and Harbour, studded with islands, and covered with shipping, steamboats, small craft, &c. including a distant sketch of Staten Island and the Narrows, taken from the Battery.

III.—The City of New-York, from the Bay; the North and East Rivers, Hoboken, Weehawk, Brooklyn Heights, Village of Brooklyn, &c.

IV.—Wall-street, about the hour of three; the Exchange, the various Banks, and other public Institutions.

These drawings have been taken expressly for this work, and will be engraved by eminent artists.

In addition to the foregoing, several wood engravings, executed in the best possible manner, representing old Dutch edifices, will be given; both as a matter of curiosity, and from a desire to preserve from oblivion traces of the dwellings of the early Dutch settlers.

Each number will contain, as heretofore, a popular piece of music, arranged for the pianoforte.

The praise which the Mirror has obtained for its typographical neatness will continue to be deserved.

From the above it is obvious that our expenses must be very materially enlarged; and we had contemplated, at one time, advancing the price of this paper to five dollars; but in consequence of the unprecedented increase of our circulation, we are induced, in preference, to trust to a still further patronage for an adequate remuneration of our labour.

Greece.—The tide of our rivers does not ebb and flow with greater certainty than popular enthusiasm rises and falls. There is this difference, however, in the two instances. The former after its fall rises again, the latter seldom if ever. Once let indifference seize the public mind, which has been wrought to the highest pitch of fervour, and vain will be every effort to rekindle the spark. It is but a few years since the Philhellene mania so occupied the attention and interested the affections of our citizens, that all other business, cares, and duties were forgotten—the one inspiring theme of thought, feeling, action, conversation, was Greece. The ordinary charities of life were yielded up at the shrine of Grecian sympathy. Principal and interest of all the humanity inherent in each individual bosom was freely, nobly, and carelessly rendered to the one engrossing object of the regeneration of the Greeks. How changed the state of things at the present day! Who now thinks of that people, or even mentions their name? Perhaps the object has been attained—perhaps Greece is free! And is she so? The fetters of Ottoman despotism have indeed been broken; the Turk no longer tramples under foot the descendants of Leonidas and Themistocles, but is the inhabitant of classic Greece free? We think not. One master—and a cruel, implacable one—has indeed been compelled to give up his power, but is there not a new one, or what is worse, are there not more masters than one in his place? This question, it would appear, ought to interest those who have hitherto professed so much zeal in behalf of suffering Greece, and have anticipated the most glorious results to literature, science, and the cause of freedom from her emancipation. The establishment of an independent government in Europe, based on principles similar to those which regulated the ancient republics of Athens and Sparta, improved by the model of the constitution of these United States, was, we had believed, one of the dearest objects of the enlightened politician and philanthropist. The choice of their own form of polity, by the emancipated Greeks, was the least demonstrable evidence of their liberty that could be required by their least sanguine friends. Even this is denied—and yet not a murmur of complaint is raised. The bodily sufferings, the hunger, and thirst, and nakedness of the Greek, had elicited aid and roused a voice in his behalf which only died away amidst the thunders of Navarino. This moral, political oppression excites no attention! The very hands which proffered assistance and delivered him from his former thralldom are about to impose a new and disgraceful yoke upon his neck—and who gainsays it? Look at the condition of the Greeks—with a man of their choice at the helm of state, they learn the news that he must be displaced—that a king must preside over them—a king not of their own making, but the creature of Wellington and Polignac, whose very name will sound barbarous to their polished ears, but whose total incompetency for a station of power, whose utter ignorance of their national character and of the habitudes of their country, whose unavoidable subserviency to the artificers of his elevation and the disposers of his fortune, must render him an object of contempt, hatred, and execration. What a consummation of hopes once so bright and fair! A flock of sheep, barely delivered from the fangs of mastiffs and catiffs—such is the condition of the Greeks. And no voice is lifted up in their behalf, no arm stretched out to save them! Who could have believed this?

Infant schools.—We were invited a few days since to visit an infant school in Mott-street, which owes its foundation and support to the benevolence of the female members of one of the congregations of Friends. And it was with real surprise that we witnessed not only the number of the pupils, but the propriety of their conduct and the perfect subordination which prevailed. There were present about one hundred and sixty, many of them so young as not yet to have acquired the power of articulation. They are all the children of poor parents, whose time is spent in labour, and who must consequently, to a certain extent, neglect the comforts and interests of their offspring. Many of these children have literally been taken from the streets, where they were allowed to wallow in filth, their health and habits neglected, and the infant germ of mind exposed to the contaminating influence of vice. Here they are placed under the kind and encouraging guidance of experienced and judicious teachers, and whether their progress in the simple exercises of the school or not, their comforts are increased, and a new and beneficial bias is given to their minds. The studies, if such they may be called, are made to assume the form of amusement, and wholesome instruction steals upon them in the semblance of recreation. The charity of those who have established this school is of the most extensive and liberal kind. It embraces the children of the poor in the vicinity, of whatever sect or condition, whether their parents are worthy or unworthy, virtuous or dissolute. It looks only to the end at which it aims—the preservation from vice and misery of those helpless beings whose parents cannot or will not protect and cherish them. If they are in want of clothes, they are supplied from the funds of the society, and if their parents cannot give them food, it is provided at the school. Some of these infants displayed in our presence an aptitude and proficiency in the science of numbers, and powers of memory, which surprised us.

It is well known that the school fund of this city has from some cause never extended to the education of infants, a deficiency which cannot but be deeply lamented. Could institutions like that which we have noticed be established in the various quarters of our city, supported by a competent fund, vast good might be effected. The morals of thousands might be preserved from corruption, and juvenile delinquency lessened in an incalculable measure. To the philanthropists of New-York a vast field is now open, in which their exertions might compass important public results, and entitle them to the gratitude of thousands. If so much can be done by private charity merely, what might we not expect if higher aid were successfully invoked! We recommend to those who feel an interest in the great cause of public education, to visit the school to which we have referred. It is kept in the basement-story of the High School in Mott-street, between Spring and Prince streets.

House of Industry.—It is devoutly to be wished that the incipient efforts in favour of such an establishment will not flag, or be entrusted to the exclusive direction of the honourable corporation. That sage body possesses great power, and is imbued with strong inclination to do good, but it is not like ordinary bodies—it cannot move otherwise than with snail pace. It projects great improvements and finally effects them, but there is a proper portion of time which from its very constitutional make it must see elapsed before it can carry its resolutions into effect. Witness the removal of the jail and bridewell—remember the erection of seats on the battery—nay, look at the very cupola of the hall—who doubts that a clock will some day or other, a century hence, admonish the citizens to note the passing hours? But the formation of a house of industry must not be left to such hands. Let them assist if they will—let them endorse notes payable ten years hence, but let the institution be forthwith got up. This is the auspicious season to secure its operations in time for the ensuing winter.

The Fulton box.—If this simple project for remunerating the children of Fulton for the benefits conferred on the world by their father—and what can be more just and honourable to our country—should be carried into general effect, the income derived from it would soon be immense, and the hand of liberality itself be prudently stayed. Some idea of what so very a trifle as one cent from each passenger would soon amount to may be gathered from a single fact, in times when travelling by steam was almost nothing in comparison with what it has since increased to. The number of passengers carried by the Commodore of the old North river line, from its commencement to discontinuing the business, amounted to upwards of one hundred and eighty-six thousand!

Agents and subscribers indebted to this establishment for the present volume, are requested to settle their accounts immediately.

OH, MURMUR NOT LOVE.

A FAVOURITE MELODY, COMPOSED BY G. WARNE.

ANDANTE AFFETTUOSO.

Oh, mur - mur not, love, mur - mur not, Though clouds our sum - mer skies de - form, That e - ver thus our mor - tal lot, Should be al - ter nate calm and storm; Ere yet the sun - ny hour was gone, A thou - sand friends seem'd kind and true, But soon the day of gloom came on, And all for - sook me, all but you.

Ad Lib.

SECOND VERSE.

Allured by pleasure's tempting ray,
Love is, alas! too apt to roam;
The tempest gathering o'er his way,
Reminds the truant of his home;
When peace her lullaby doth sing,
The bosom may be fondly prest,
But oh! 'tis in the storm we cling
The closest to affection's breast.

VARIETIES.

MECHANICAL POWERS.—If the abilities of man were limited by the extent of his natural strength, small indeed would be his knowledge of the works of nature, and few the refinements and comforts of civilized society. We can hardly look upon any production of art which could have been obtained without the aid of mechanical contrivances. Hence we may conclude, that the construction of machines must have been long antecedent to a knowledge of the theory upon which their principles depend. The remains of Egyptian architecture exhibit the most surprising marks of mechanical genius. The stones laid upon the tops of the pyramids of Egypt are each of them equal in size to a small house! The elevation of such immense ponderous masses, to the tops of these and other stupendous fabrics, must have required an accumulation of mechanical power, which the architect of the present day cannot regard without astonishment.

MARIA LOUISA.—When Vienna was bombarded by the French, in 1809, Maria Louisa was the only member of the imperial family that remained in the capital. She was too ill to be removed. Buonaparte was informed of the fact, and he gave orders for the shells to spare the abode of the invalid. He became interested in her fate, and made constant inquiries about her. It is probable that at this moment he resolved to displace Josephine; and it so happened that soon after, at the treaty of Schoenbrunn, he stipulated for her hand. In the month of March, 1810, the espousal of the imperial pair was celebrated at Vienna, and on the first of April they were married in Paris by cardinal Fesch.

FARMER AND STORE-KEEPER.—A farmer in Connecticut, who has occupied the same farm on lease for about thirty years past, was lately complaining that he had not been able to lay up any thing from his thirty years' labour. A neighbouring store-keeper offered to explain to him the reason, and proceeded as follows—"During the thirty years that you have been on that farm, I have been trading in this store, and the distilled spirits I have sold you, with the interest of the money, would have made you the owner of the farm you hire." On examination of the books of the store-keeper his assertion was found correct. The farm was worth about five thousand dollars.

TOOTH-POWDER.—The following is given as the correct mode of preparing the celebrated French tooth-powder, called poudre Peruvienne:—White sugar thirty-six grains, cream of tartar seventy-two, magnesia seventy-two, starch seventy-two, mace two, cinnamon six, sulphate of quinine (or quinia) three, and carmine five grains. All these substances are reduced to a fine powder, and mixed together with great care; then add four drops of oil of roses, and as much oil of mint.

JUDGE PARSONS.—The following anecdote is illustrative of the character of the late Judge Parsons. A gentleman had been concerned in a duel; the ball of his antagonist struck his watch, and remained there. It thus saved his life. The watch was afterwards exhibited, with the ball remaining in it, in a company where Judge P. was present. It was observed by several that it was a valuable watch. "Yes," said Parsons, "very excellent: it has kept time from eternity."

CROMWELL'S SKULL.—A person visiting the London museum of curiosities, was shown the skull of Oliver Cromwell. "It is extremely small," said the visitor. "Bless you, sir," replied the cicerone, "it was his skull when he was a little boy."

SUNDAY MAILS.—The National Intelligencer, speaking of Sunday mails, recommends those who are conscientious on the subject, to write on the outside of their communications which have to pass through the post-offices the words "not to be forwarded on the Sabbath." The postmaster would, no doubt, respect the request.

MR. HALLECK.—The following is from the London Literary Gazette of the tenth of April last:—"Mr. Halleck, one of the sweetest and most popular bards of America, is about to give the world a new poem. The subject is supposed to be the 'Minute Men,' from which it is said his lines on Connecticut are extracted."

A NEW MELO-DRAMA.—A piece called the Wigwam, founded on Cooper's novel of the Pioneers, has been produced at Covent Garden.

MADemoiselle SONTAG.—The Court Journal says, "We are enabled to state, on the authority of a letter from a lady of the first distinction in Berlin, that Mademoiselle Sontag has been undoubtedly married to the count de Rossi; but that suspicions of a most unfounded nature, on the part of the count, have caused a temporary separation, which it is probable will, after all, be of short duration."

When a true genius appears in the world, you may know him by this sign—that the dunces are all in a confederacy against him.

GEORGE F. MORRIS, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

Published every Saturday, at the corner of Nassau and Ann streets.—Terms four dollars per annum, payable in advance.—No subscription received for a less period than one year.

J. GRIMMOUD, PRINTER, JOHN STREET.

Digitized by Google

NEW-YORK MIRROR,

AND LADIES' LITERARY GAZETTE.

VOLUME VII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 12, 1830.

NUMBER 49.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

LINES WRITTEN TO AN UNKNOWN LADY.

FAIR stranger, thou hast asked a boon
Of one to thee unknown,
A lone and nameless wanderer
On life's Sahara thrown;
The boon—my humble lyre's best note—
I give without regret,
Though in the fond familiar clasp
Our hands have never met.

Yet in the mind's congenial thoughts,
By dreamy night or day—
Free thoughts, that through all space and time
Pursue their social way;
And in the heart's deep sympathies,
Its gladness or its groan,
Our spirits have full oft perchance
A sweet communion known.

Therefore whene'er thy pensive eye
My simple verse shall trace,
Though all unmeet its numbers are
This spotless leaf to grace—
Deem that a brother's kindly hand
Inscribed each humble line,
And that a brother's warmest wish
Is breathed for thee and thine.

It is, that all for whom thy heart
Feels aught of tenderness,
Through all the future scenes may be
As blest as thou wouldst bless;
And that to thee, my stranger friend,
In fulness may be given,
The solace of a spotless soul,
The peace and smiles of heaven.

PROTEUS.

A SKETCH.

I saw her when the earnest glow
Of dreams, whose home is found in heaven,
And an unearthly bliss bestow,
Was to her ardent fancy given;
And picturing all things in their ray
The world a joyous scene became,
Where hope's unfettered wing could play,
And sorrow's cloud was but a name.

And as her peerless beauty grew
And ripened in her pleasant face,
Affection o'er her aspect threw
The sunshine of unsullied grace;
And like a habitation above—
A seraph, briefly lingering here,
That being, to the eye of love
Did in her early life appear.

Years swept along—and she became
A heartless and a giddy thing;
On a false shrine's unholy flame
She pour'd her spirit's offering.
Alas! her dreams were wasted soon,
For pleasure wore her heart away;
Life's morning waned into the noon
Of restless fashion's dazzling ray.

And many bow'd, and swore, and sigh'd—
While true to none, and false to all,
Upon her charms that maid relied
To bind new followers in her thrall.
But years roll'd on—her eye grew dim;
Her brow with furrows thickly set;
Time hushed the joy of pleasure's hymn,
And she—lorn spinster—lingers yet! EVERARD.

TO ISABELLA.

Listen, gentle lady, listen,
Prithee do not turn away,
Let one glance, one only, glisten
On my humble roundelay.

I thought my rocky heart was wasted
By the tear-drops it distils;
That my soul too deeply tasted
Of the poison-cup of ills:

That the hours had gone for ever,
Like the gold of boyhood's mine,
When reason, without one endeavour,
Knelt and prayed at beauty's shrine.

I had deemed all feelings blasted,
By the lightning shaft of grief,
And their mouldering relics lasted,
Never more to shoot a leaf.

But my heart was only frozen,
Waiting some dissolving art,
Such as thou, young beauty's chosen,
From thine eye-beams canst impart.

Listen, gentle lady, listen,
Prithee do not turn away,
Let one glance, one only, glisten
On my humble roundelay.

If there's aught this heart to brighten
With the joy of younger years,
Or its pilgrim-path to lighten,
'Tis to sing while beauty hears:

And to feel the light that flashes,
When with her encircling spells
Pity lifts the silken lashes
Where the sun of beauty dwells.

Be it favour or displeasure,
I rejoice or I repine—
Let me only see the treasure
Dazzling in those eyes of thine.

Listen, gentle lady, listen,
Prithee do not turn away,
Let one glance, one only, glisten
On my humble roundelay.

ALPHA.

ORIGINAL MORAL TALES.

THE RIVAL MOTHERS.

IN TWO CHAPTERS.—CHAP. II.

MONEY was procured, the preparations continued, when one day while Mr. Alleyn and his son were sitting together, they were surprised by the appearance of officers of justice, who entered the room, and advancing to Edmund, informed him he was their prisoner.

"Your prisoner! for what?" exclaimed the astonished youth.

"You are accused of forgery."

Too indignant to speak, Edmund turned to his father. Mr. Alleyn, pale as death and trembling in every nerve with emotion, covered his face with his hands.

"Dear father, do not let this alarm you thus; here is some mistake."

"I think not," said the constable, "for we have the checks you forged on Mr. G. and the one you presented yourself two days ago."

"That check," said Edmund impatiently, "was no forgery; it was given me by my father."

"Well, young gentleman, I do not pretend to say who did it, but take care how you criminate your father; if it was not you, it must have been he."

Edmund gazed on his father. The thoughts which darted through his mind were horrible, but they were immediately banished. Certain of his father's, as well as his own innocence, he smiled at his sudden misgiving.

"My son," said Mr. Alleyn, "I would speak with you alone. Ask those men to leave the room; I will detain you but a moment, and you cannot escape if you would."

The constable, having ascertained that this last assertion was correct, left the apartment and stationed himself near the door.

"Edmund," cried Mr. Alleyn, when they were alone, "what shall I do! what will become of me! will you save your poor old father?"

"Save you, sir! why it is I who am in danger, if any exists—it is I who am accused!"

"Alas!" said the miserable man, while drops of agony stood upon his forehead, "I can conceal it no longer!—I—I forged those checks, to save your mother from grief and mortification; but oh! how much more have I brought upon her now!"

Edmund, horror struck, unable to speak or move, sat listening to his father's dreadful confession, while every word seemed to steal strength and life away.

The officers of justice re-entered the room and terminated the agitating conference. Edmund was hurried from the house half-distracted with the agonizing and confused ideas that crowded upon his mind. Mr. Alleyn, by great exertion, obtained him bail; and now all awaited in anxious uncertainty the result of the trial. Edmund resolved in his own mind that he would not accuse himself, this he owed to truth and honour, but at the same time firmly resolved that not a word in defence of himself should escape him which could possibly implicate his father. The trial, however, (which, notwithstanding Mr. Alleyn's sanguine hopes, must have brought the truth to light) never took place. The gentleman whose name had been forged, always respected Edmund, and now, in pity for his youth and the grief of his friends, and, perhaps suspecting who was the real criminal, withdrew the prosecution and endeavoured to hush up the affair. Mr. Alleyn communicated this intelligence in a burst of joy to his son. But of what avail was this to Edmund now? He had escaped all danger of the law for the offence with which he was charged, but that much severer punishment to a sensitive mind had already fallen upon him—his fair fame was blasted! He had been accused of forgery—the knowledge of it had gone far and wide—and although a court of justice had not tried and condemned him, he knew, in the minds of many, he was regarded as a criminal—what remained to make life valuable?

He had not seen Cornelia since the day of his accusation. Her parents, eager to seize upon any opportunity to prevent a marriage so disagreeable to them, forbade her to hold any future intercourse with one so guilty as they believed Edmund to be. Cornelia, who scorned control when about to do what she believed an act of justice to Edmund, wrote and entreated him to see her. But in vain—he continued inflexible. He had resigned her, he said, and every thing in this world which was once valuable or dear to him. He should spend the remainder of his days in solitude, and never wished to look upon the face of a human being more.

A few days after the prosecution had been relinquished, Edmund, alone, as usual, sat leaning his head upon his hand, when suddenly, with the restlessness of anguish, he threw back his head and gazed around the apartment—a figure stood before him—it was Cornelia. Her arms were folded, her eyes fixed upon him.

"What do you here?" said Edmund gloomily; "do you come to look upon a criminal?"

"No, Edmund, I come to gaze upon an innocent, although weak man."

"How know you that I am innocent?"

"My heart tells me so! you cannot deceive me. If all the world accused you, it would not shake my faith in you one moment! But this you knew before. I come not to tell you of my undiminished confidence, but to upbraid you with your weakness. Your father, not yourself, is guilty!"

"Oh hush! for heaven's sake, be silent!"

"I will not," she said, raising her voice; "I care not if the whole world hears me! Mr. Alleyn has committed a crime, and too base to bear the punishment, he has blasted the fame of his son. But let not that son think," Cornelia continued, in a tone of bitterness, "that by consenting to a sacrifice he has performed a heroic deed. He is mistaken—he has sullied the purity of his reputation—he has cast away his happiness, and the happiness of others confided to his keeping, with a vain hope of saving the character of his father—but the truth is known, the sacrifice is useless!"

"Dear Cornelia," said Edmund sadly, "even if this were true, how could I act differently? I am the victim of destiny, of circumstances."

"Of circumstances!" exclaimed Cornelia; "you are the victim of your own want of energy. Your fame and honour you allow to be unjustly sullied. Why do you not come forth manfully and declare the truth? You are just entering life—your father must soon leave it. Nay, do not turn so gloomily away—it must be done, justice demands it—you cannot tarnish your father's fame, I repeat, for that is ruined already. His character was before this event supported on so insecure a foundation, that the world now believes he was the instigator, the real criminal, and you his instrument or his willing tool. You cannot make him appear more guilty, but may rescue your own name from infamy."

"No! no—Cornelia! it is all over now—my destiny is accomplished—I will never move one step to criminate my father. Do not deprive me of the consoling hope that by the sacrifice of my own, his honour has been saved. This is all that is left me now—all but your affection. Oh, Cornelia, dearest, best beloved, do you indeed think me innocent of this dark deed? But my heart told me you would never suspect me of such baseness—this has cheered my solitary hours, and will cheer the few remaining to me now."

"Edmund!" said Cornelia, while she struggled with the fearful foreboding which was fast subduing the firmness of her heart, when she heard his deep melancholy voice and gazed on his pale and sunken features, "do not be thus depressed; live for me, and far from this selfish spot, we may yet be happy together!"

"And shall it be said that Cornelia Blakely, my Cornelia married a felon? No! far be such humiliation from you! we are separated here, Cornelia."

"No! no!" she passionately exclaimed. "I will go this moment—I will accuse your father—he shall do you justice."

She rushed from the room. Cornelia could not succeed in bringing this affair again before the courts of justice; but the broken-hearted Alleyn, who had never known a happy moment while the dreadful consciousness of crime and injustice to his son was preying upon him, confessed every thing. But it was too late. Edmund's frame, never robust, had been so shaken by such terrible emotion, that the joy of knowing his own fame was cleared, and the anguish he felt on witnessing his father's remorse and misery, was more than he could support. He declined rapidly, and died in the arms of his wretched parents, a victim to their evil passions. Cornelia saw her exertions to save him were in vain—the object of her passionate devotion was taken from her—all that endeared her to life was gone. The Blakelys soon mourned over the loss of the pride and ornament of their family.

PLUMA.

DEFERRED ARTICLES.

INDIAN CHARACTER.

THE absence of our regular historians among the Indians is, and should be, a source of much regret to those who delight to store their minds with those facts connected with the original possessors of that soil which now opens the bosom of its wealth to beings of almost another origin. Having dwelt some time with and near them, I have used considerable diligence, at various times, in endeavouring to ascertain how and in what manner, if any, they have preserved the remembrance of remarkable events among them. Whether they had traditional or legendary tales of the origin of their tribes—whether they knew the time when the country in which they resided was first occupied by them—whether, in that case, it was unoccupied or in possession of their Indians—and whether they conquered or purchased the country so occupied. My inquiries have also extended to their wars, the arts, and wiles practised by their most distinguished warriors, the nature of their pretended intercourse with the Great Spirit, how many spirits they supposed possessed an influence over their tribes, what they thought of futurity, and what their general ideas were of moral and social duties and obligations. I have seldom received, to any of these inquiries, a clear and satisfactory answer.

They have traditions, but of so confused a nature, and so mysteriously combined with men and beasts, extraordinary transformations from one to the other, and so thoroughly involved in the clouds of superstition, that they are rendered utterly unintelligible to all but the Indians themselves.

Their songs constitute their history, but as dates are entirely neglected (for they "keep no note of time,") it is impossible for the oldest man among them to fix events thus narrated upon any particular period of time. There is one source, however, of instructive amusement among them, and that is, to sit and listen to the rehearsal of the warlike achievements that have been performed within the remembrance of the narrator, and possibly by him. He often tells them with spirit and sprightliness, and can generally say how many winters are passed by since they were acted. No one but he who resided among them knows, or can know, the fund of military anecdotes, if I may so call it, in their possession.

No one knows, or can know, the surprising acts of valour performed by them, sometimes as a tribe, but more generally by individuals. Under an excitement, particularly after a little success, there are no people on earth braver or more daring, even to rashness, than they are. Once under this excitement, alone or among thousands, an Indian sees nothing but the object of his rage, if an enemy, or of his love, if a friend. In fact, they are educated for brave men. Influence and wealth are only for the brave, and the highest seat at the council fire, or the most important character in the dance, is always awarded to him who passes for the bravest man. Indians (I speak of those on the upper Missouri) are underrated. White men talk, and I suppose think as they talk, as if twenty common men, well armed, could drive the prairies for Indians as they would beat a jungle of deer. This is idle talk. These Indians have yet to learn who are their superiors in their own method of fighting. Perfect horsemen, they know their strength, when mounted, better than the whites would have them believe. No men but mounted men can ever, except in large bodies, safely travel the country where they live or roam. Their morale (as Napoleon called the impression of strength or force on the mind) is very considerable, and, with experienced men, often creates a sudden panic or astonishment that proves their ruin before sufficient time elapses for them to recover their self-possession. Painted, almost naked, and at full speed, they rush upon their foes suddenly from an ambush, with a yell apparently of delight at the prospect of blood. The hideous expression of their countenance has, at the same time, an appalling effect to those unaccustomed to their mode of painting themselves. The first effect is intended for, and often is, an almost perfect stupefaction. Here lies their strength on the plain or where they can act with celerity, and they who can retain self-possession at the onset, with a tolerably adequate force, have nothing to fear afterwards. Without retaining that (which the main effort of the Indians is to destroy) the chances are against escape. Many a white man has gone to these prairies confident of his abilities for self-protection, and been literally cut to pieces by the tomahawk whilst on his horse with his loaded rifle in his hand. They might have been, probably were brave, but they allowed themselves to be astonished, and all from underrating their foes.

There is another strong trait of character in Indians—their singular pride. Squaws frequently cry Indians into acts of vengeance and retaliation, but they have a stronger influence even than that over them; a squaw can laugh or shame an Indian to commit the most wanton act of murder, cruelty, and inhumanity. Her jeers and taunts, after an unsuccessful "to-tong" of a war party, will send an Indian forth alone, without rest or delay, under the pledge of the most sacred oath known to him, that he will not return without a scalp or a prisoner. To redeem this pledge, and satisfy the oath, he will commit the most barbarous and disgustingly inhuman acts. It is under the influence of this feeling that he becomes what among the Indians is called foolish, that is, perfectly reckless of life. It is singular, but nevertheless true, that the Indians should look with such utter contempt upon every thing like effeminacy, and still be so much under their squaws. No greater term of reproach can be bestowed by them upon an individual than to call him a squaw. It signifies that he is a beast of burden. Squaws scarcely ever approach the council, the feast, or the dance, that is, a national or medical dance. They follow and obey their lords and masters apparently in silence. Still, these very women, as among us, manage to govern in every thing they wish. They do it by appearing not to do it. The Indian always appears the master, and, satisfied with the appearance, suffers himself to be mastered.

Indians are the most desperate gamblers in the world, considering their means. One would be astonished to witness their stakes. I have seen them sit successive hours, and sometimes days, at their games, alternately winning and losing, until one of them rose stripped of all his wealth, horses, gun, and of every thing but the rag, as we might say, of modesty. This would be called ruin by the civilized world, but it causes no despair or suicide with them, and all that an observer would perceive is perhaps a little mortified pride at his defeat. The young squaws having more leisure, are more constant gamblers than the men. I have seen a young squaw pull ornament after ornament from her arm, bead after bead from her neck, and brooch after brooch from her bosom, until she had lost the whole, and then probably pawn her clothes for another game. The greatest game that I ever heard of, however, was between a Crow and a Chayenne. It was told me as a well known fact by a man residing among the Crows, and confirmed by the Crows themselves through an interpreter. About four years since the Crows and Chayennes were, as they have almost always been, at war. In fact, I do not know that they ever met peaceably except in the single instance I am about to relate. In a state of hostility, of course war parties were continually roaming in search of favourable opportunities to strike with success, and with as little risk as possible, it happened that two hostile parties were encamped, without the knowledge of either, near each other. They had both been out a long time, and had seen no "signs" of an enemy, and of course became considerably discouraged. After a little reflection, and within a day or two of the same time, both parties resolved to return to their respective tribes. It happened also, that one of each party refused (pledged by an oath, or afraid of the ridicule of some favourite squaw) to return. This is very common among them, and it excites no surprise, even after success, that one or two should separate from the main party and go forth alone, sometimes for a definite object, and sometimes not. These two men were left by their respective comrades in the mountains, near Powder river, and for two days following they remained near where they were left. On the third, and near nightfall, they had selected their lodging-places near each other, still ignorant of their vicinity. The Chayenne was going down and the Crow up, a ravine that gradually descended, at that place, towards the river. The former laid himself down among the rocks in the bottom of the ravine, but the latter, thinking from the appearance of the sky that it would rain, and knowing how the water rushed in torrents down these ravines, crawled up its side, and there, under the shelter of a friendly rock, arranged himself for repose. As the Crow expected, one of those sudden and tremendous showers common to that country came on; he, however, lay unmolested by it. Not so with the Chayenne—hearing the roar of the coming torrent, he hastened to secure himself from being washed away or dashed to death against the rocks, by groping out a passage up the side, hardly knowing, in the dark, whether he was going to safety or destruction. After feeling around, and managing to get about one hundred yards from where the water had driven him, he came accidentally to the rock which sheltered the Crow. In endeavouring to ascertain its position with the ground, he placed his hand upon the bare shoulder of his enemy.

As it may be expected, they both started, the one back and the other up, with their usual exclamation of surprise—"Wha!" said they, as they stood gazing and lighting up their gaze with the fire of their own eye-balls. What is very unusual among Indians on a war party, they were both taken by surprise, both unprepared, and both, too, searching for enemies. The night was very dark, the ground precipitous and uneven, and both were hesitating what to do, not knowing but each other had friends close at hand. At length the Chayenne made signs that he would lie down for the night, and that in the morning they should try their prowess. It was arranged, and two brave and mortal foes, until that instant, lay down side by side under the same rock.

I question if either slept, still they continued in their recumbent posture until morning came, and both, assured of their novel situation, laughed at its singularity: from a laugh they began their signs, and at length determined, that, as either allowed the other's tribe to be the bravest in the world, they would try their strength or skill in gambling. They commenced, and the game continued fluctuating for some time, until, after about two hours, the Crow won all the arms, provisions, and clothes of the Chayenne. After standing a few moments in thought, he arrested the progress of the Crow in packing up his winnings, by saying he would stake his scalp. The Crow, of course, eagerly engaged again, thinking probably it was a cheap way to acquire such a trophy; but fortune favoured the brave, and from that instant the Chayenne commenced winning. He continued until he had not only won back all his own, but all the Crow had, leaving him as destitute as the Chayenne was a short time before. He could now do no less than his antagonist had done. The Crow's scalp was now at stake. Both were anxious, and both played cautiously. It would not do, the Crow lost his scalp, and the Chayenne proceeded very deliberately to take it off. The operation was completed, and the Crow was pronounced the greatest bravo in existence.

After some little conversation, praising each other, (all by signs) they separated, under the promise of again playing should they ever meet, at the same time assuring each other, that they would strive to bring the tribes, or parts of each, together.

In about three months, true to their promise, they met, the Indians consenting to the meeting, for the purpose of witnessing such a game. Again they played, lost and won alternately for some time, both better guarded as to their scalps than before, the one having none, and the other having a large quantity of things to lose before his would come into the play. Luck, however, settled down in favour of the Crow, and as the scalp of the other became the stake, the anxiety of the Chayenne showed itself by the deepest and most silent attention, whilst, on the other hand, a murmur of encouragement passed along the line of Crows for their champion. The game drew to a close. Every eye was attention. Their very respiration was checked, and the dogs themselves hushed their

* I have never heard of but two squaws who have partaken in the mysteries of medicine dances of their tribes. One of these is a Sac squaw, now living near the Mississippi river, and the other was a Sioux, of the Yanton tribe. She died about two years since. These medicine squaws may always be known from the fact that they are the only ones who ever smoke or to whom the Indians on any occasion ever offer a pipe. How different with civilized women!

barkings into low growls. It was but for an instant, for an exulting shout soon announced the success of the Crow.

The same operation that he performed on the Crow was submitted to by the Chayenne, and after a little feasting, the two tribes separated for the first and last time, in peace. **

LITERARY NOTICES.

LEXINGTON, AND OTHER FUGITIVE POEMS.

We are much pleased to learn that a highly finished volume is shortly forthcoming from the press of the Messrs. Carvill, under the above title, the authorship of which is correctly attributed to a poet, the merited popularity of whose previous productions gives us warranty for the success of this effort.

TALES AND SKETCHES.

Mr. E. Bliss has in press a new work, in two volumes, with this title. From the report of those who have had an opportunity of seeing the manuscript, we are inclined to believe that it will prove an amusing production. It is understood to be from the pen of one of the editors of the Courier and Enquirer.

DR. PEIXOTTO'S DISCOURSE.

We have read with deep interest the impressive and eloquent Discourse delivered by Dr. Peixotto before "The Society for the Education of Orphan Children, and the Relief of Indigent Persons of the Jewish Persuasion." The objects of this association have a powerful claim on the sympathies and support of the whole community. We have only time in the present number to offer the following extract, as a specimen of the author's style:

LITERATURE OF THE JEWS.

To the interests of education the Jews have ever been attentive. This attention has varied indeed with the circumstances by which they have been surrounded, having been contracted shut out from the lights of improvement; but ever active whenever free scope was given to their national energies. This assertion may appear somewhat paradoxical to those who believe that the Jews never cherished a love of letters, or never had a literature of their own—a slanderous reproach, which has been heaped upon them, time after time, even since it found its ablest champion in a philosopher of the last century, distinguished alike for the versatility of his genius, the extent of his accomplishments, the number of his writings, and for his historical inaccuracy and critical disingenuousness, whenever biblical subjects were the objects of his bitter irony and pungent sarcasm. In an attempt to refute this foul aspersion, we are met and opposed by a prejudice, which is too commonly cherished, and from which a great number, I fear, of Jews themselves are not wholly exempt. The very designation carries associated with it ideas of superstition, avarice, troublesome ceremonies, and distinctions. The Bible, too, with a fidelity to truth, of which we may challenge a parallel in the historical records of any other nation, exposes the vices and corruptions of the Jews, as well as their virtues. The crimes of David are recorded as well as his meritorious and patriotic acts. Hence we connect ideas of a proneness to idolatry, of a stiff-necked and rebel disposition with their character. We should recollect, however, that this is but one side of the picture; that the Israelites were selected for great and pre-eminent purposes; and as they occupied a lofty station, so their failings necessarily cast their shadows more broad and wide. Let us compare them, however, with contemporaneous nations; ay, even with those, whom to hold in the highest veneration, seems to be the too prominent object of a liberal education—the Greeks and the Romans—and we shall find that, while the Israelites possessed every thing that was valuable in the customs of other nations, they were free from most of their defects, and only degenerated in proportion as they departed from their own simplicity, to imitate their neighbours' corruption and luxurious refinements. To place this subject in a clearer point of view, let us descend to a few particulars, which cannot be void of interest at any time.

I. The writings of the Hebrews are generally acknowledged to be unequalled for the simplicity and dignity—the strength, conciseness, and boldness of their style; the perfect truth to nature of their imagery; their animated eloquence and sublime figures. The conceits and puerile vanities which disgrace much of classical literature, are altogether banished from their pages. It may, however, be suggested that these writings were inspired. This assertion is more imposing by its speciousness than forcible by its application. The great truths and sublime doctrines which were inculcated by Moses and the Prophets, were undoubtedly derived from immediate communication with the Almighty. It does not follow thence that every word and sentence were literally dictated to them. Where this was done, it is expressly stated. The great outlines were furnished, but the filling up of the canvass was left to the genius and industry of the elevated instruments of divine intercourse with man. This is sufficiently proved by the diversity of style apparent in the different authors, and by the peculiar individuality of each. Hence the nerve and chaste simplicity of the Pentateuch; the majesty and sublime elevation of Isaiah; the terrific grandeur of Ezekiel; the tender elegiac melancholy of Jeremiah; the strength and loftiness of Job; and the rich, harmonious, and varied grace of Daniel. However we dispose of this question, it is certain that the perfection of the language, and its division into prose and poetry, abundantly testify to the high state of its cultivation; and that the intellectual improvement of a nation must have made considerable advances, to whom such compositions were addressed, or who could relish the simple beauties of the scriptural style.

II. The schools of the philosophers furnish another evidence of the mental cultivation of the Hebrews. In the cities of the south, bordering upon Hebron, the higher ministers enjoyed all that could be offered by the munificent liberality of the state. Here were the means of mental culture provided for them. Copies of the sacred books, multiplied in every form and adorned with the finest skill of the pencil and the sculptor, in gold and precious stones, attested the reverence of the nation for the law, and the perfection to which they had brought the decorative arts. Nor were the works of foreign profane writers withheld; all those eminent for the learning they conveyed, or the genius they displayed, or the singularity of the subjects of which they treated, were here to be found. Here the student might relax his spirit from the sublime studies of his religion by the bold and brilliant poetry, the comprehensive and varied philosophy, or the vigorously unalloyed eloquence of Greece; or he might plunge into the mysterious metaphysics of Egypt, whose science has been aptly compared to the mummy, which preserves the form, without the living principle of man. The Hebrews became especially renowned for their intellectual culture in the days of King David, and Solomon was undoubtedly instructed in the schools to which we have just referred—"Solomon the wisest and best of kings, who spake of trees from the cedar that is in Lebanon, even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall; who spake also concerning beasts, and of fowl, and of reptiles, and of fishes." The very attempt to treat of natural history marks no ordinary progress in science, on the part both of the instructor and of those to whom the instruction was addressed.

Private education was not neglected among them. They were in fact the only people that instructed their children in truths capable of inspiring them with the love and fear of God, and exciting them to virtuous deeds. That their daughters were not overlooked, appears to be sufficiently proved by the songs of Miriam and of Deborah, and by the prayer of Hannah.

"While the woman of the east was immured behind bolts and bars, from time immemorial a prisoner, and the woman of the west was a toy, a savage, or a slave, our wives and maidens enjoyed the intercourses of society which their talents were well calculated to cheer and to adorn. They were skilled in the harp, their sweet voices tuned to the richest strains of earth, they were graceful in the dance, the writings of our bards were in their hands, and what nation ever possessed such illustrious founts of thought and virtue?"

III. Music, of all sensual enjoyments the most intellectual—that glorious painting to the ear, is the handmaid of poetry, and goes hand in hand with her and the other fine arts in humanizing and polishing the mind. A nation which neglects music altogether, is generally noted for its savage manners and cruelty, while those which cultivate it are generally refined and benevolent. Now no people ever cultivated music with more zeal and keener relish than the Hebrews. They insisted on having it at their marriages, on anniversary birth days which reminded them of victories over their enemies, at the inauguration of their kings, in their public worship, and when they were coming from afar to attend their festivals. We may form some idea of the perfection to which this humane art had reached in the days of David, when we recollect that in order to give the best effect to the music of the tabernacle he appointed four thousand Levites, divided into twenty-four classes, who sang psalms and accompanied them with instrumental music, the harp, the psaltery, the organ, the cymbal, the several trumpets and wind instruments, the high-gayon, the gittith, and the mahalath.

IV. It has been objected to the Israelites that they are by nature averse from mechanical and agricultural employments. No accusation can be less tenable than this. In their own country where they enjoyed perfect freedom and choice of pursuit, and, after all, it is there only that an impartial estimate of their character can be formed, they were supremely renowned for their agricultural zeal and mechanical industry. Jacob tended flocks, Moses was a herdsman, Gideon was thrashing corn when the angel announced to him that he should be the deliverer of his people; Ruth, the interesting Ruth, the heroine of a romantic narrative, which will not suffer in tenderness and simplicity of pathos in comparison with the most captivating creations of modern fiction, was found by Boaz gleaning at his harvest; Saul, though a king, was found driving oxen when he received intelligence of the danger of Jabez Gilead; David was keeping sheep when Samuel sent after him to anoint him king of Israel. That the mechanical arts thrived, we have abundant evidence in the recorded description of the beautiful architecture of the tabernacle, and in the express intimation of the fact that David at his death left many artificers in his kingdom of all sorts; masons, carpenters, blacksmiths, goldsmiths, and those who worked in stone, wood, and metals.

How ill founded then is the contumelious reproach which denies to the Israelite the very possession of intellect and industry, or the taste for their active exercise and improvement!

We have thus far spoken of our people when in their full possession of national glory. This possession was not to last. The glory of Ichabod was to depart, and Jerusalem was to become the spoiled, the desolate, the utterly put to shame; the plough was to be driven through the soil where had stood the holy of holies! The people were to be scattered to the four quarters of the earth! And should we now no more discover traces of their ancient powers, now that they have been forcibly torn by the root from the land of their inheritance, can we feel emotions of surprise? Should we not expect that when all his bright possessions had passed from before him, that Judah's sweet-toned lyre would be struck dumb, and Sion's minstrels would hang their harps on the willows, and her daughters, when urged by the task-master to sing their native melodies, would mournfully cry out—"Alas, how can we sing the song of the Most High in a strange land?"

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

TRANSPARENT door plates are now sometimes substituted for opaque ones. They are formed of painted glass, and lighted by the hall lamp. They appear exceedingly well adapted for the use of medical men who are likely to be wanted in the night, when inquiry would be unavailing, and certainly form a good substitute for the external lantern usually employed. It would contribute greatly to the safety of those buildings with a small ground bull's eye was fixed into every door with the name and number of the occupier of the office painted on it, which, during candle lighting time in the evening, would be very useful, as the name and number would be legible without the lights within. Such bull's eyes, if fixed in the doors of persons liable to be called up in the night, would be most useful, as a common lobby lamp would enable any person to ascertain the name or number.

TRANSPARENT WATCH.—A watch has been presented to the Academy of Sciences of Paris, constructed of very peculiar materials, the parts being formed of rock crystal. It was made by M. Rebellier, and is small in size. The internal works are all visible; the two toothed wheels are of metal, to prevent accidents by the breaking of the spring. All the screws are fixed in crystals, and all the axes turn in rubies. The escapement is of sapphire, the balance wheel of rock-crystal, and its spring of gold. The regularity of this watch as a timekeeper, is attributed by the maker to the feeble expansion of the rock-crystal in the balance wheel, &c. The execution of the whole shows to what a state of perfection the art of cutting precious stones has been carried in modern times.

HINGES, SCREWS.—A Boston paper says there is a mechanic in that city who possesses the secret, which has been heretofore only known in England, of constructing an apparatus to turn out screws with little labour and great rapidity. The same mechanic has invented a plan for the casting of hinges, by which half the ordinary labour will be saved, and better hinges produced. As the raw material in this country is cheaper than in England, it is supposed that seventy-five per cent. may be saved by the application of the new invention. The same paper adds, "the secret of this invention is now for sale to the capitalists of this country."

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

THE RAMBLER.—NUMBER TWENTY-ONE.

EATING.

He had not dined;
The veins unfilled, our blood is cold, and then
We pout upon the morning, ere we snapt
To give or to forgive, but, when we have stuffed
These pipes and these conveyances of our blood
With wine and feeding, we have suppler souls
Than in our priest like fasts.—Shaks.

VERY true: and if old Menenius did not succeed in his application to the inflexible Roman to spare his country, it was not for want of a correct knowledge of the acerbity produced by an empty stomach, and the mollifying effects of good victuals upon the temper; at the same time it presents strange and mortifying images to the mind of the littleness of human nature, and the insignificant causes which are not unfrequently the main spring of mighty events. "He had not dined," reasons the old man, and to the degree of flatulency and acidity produced in Coriolanus's stomach by his not having done so, Menenius ascribes his rejection of the prayers of the grave senators and virgins to save immortal Rome. It may be that he was right; and perhaps the fate of the eternal city depended materially upon as mean a thing as Tullus Aufidius's cook! "So runs the world away." But the truth is, since the days of Adam, eating has never been, for any length of time, out of fashion; and though abstemiousness is allowed by many to be a virtue, it is one that has been always more praised than practised. For my own part I think it is rather an unamiable weakness—a phantom which haunts the imagination of nervous people, valetudinarians, and such as are continually scheming how to spin out the thread of a miserable existence after all their capabilities for pleasure and enjoyment have passed away. Besides, it is strenuously recommended by physicians, and is therefore to be distrusted, for no man perseveringly labours against his own interest. Moreover, if the looks and tables of our worthy New-York M. D.s. are to be taken as a criterion, it is quite evident that, however they may enforce abstemiousness upon others, "they never set it up to fright themselves." This is, to say the least, suspicious, and I for one conscientiously believe, that if ever water-gruels, weak broths, or vegetable diet comes into fashion, the human species will soon fade away from the face of the earth—that living skeletons will be no rarity, and a man of one hundred pounds a monster of corpulency—that the poor old world will fall into an atrophy, and that some future Calvin Edson, divested of his superfluous flesh, will personify Campbell's "last man!"

In literature, eating has always cut a conspicuous figure. The old dramatists are filled with soul, or rather stomach, felt descriptions of rich luscious feasts; and though in those days a Ude or a Kitchiner had not enlightened the world by his wonderful discoveries, our ancestors were luxurious rogues notwithstanding. Only see with what unction Ben Jonson makes one of his characters sum up now unheard-of dishes:

I'll have
The tongues of carps, dormico, and camel's heels
Boiled in the spirits of Sol, and dissolved pearl,
Apicua's diet, 'gainst the epilepsy;
My footboys shall eat pheasants, calver'd salmones,
Kuoia, godwits, lampreys, I myself will have
The beards of barbels served instead of salads;
Oiled mushrooms, &c.

and Fielding and Smollett's heroes are good for nothing without their dinner; they must have solid meat and strong drink to invigorate and stimulate them for either war or courtship. Feed them well, or they disgrace themselves—make love in a very awkward and insipid manner, and are apt to have their courage called in question.

After this, came the terrific style of writing, of which Mrs. Radcliffe was the head, and indeed, almost the only one worth reading. Novels at this time were so filled with trap-doors, dungeons, secret stair-cases, winding galleries, subterraneous passages, shrieks, and midnight assassinations, that it is presumed these horrors entirely took away the appetites of the persons concerned, for no mention is made of eating, though from the frequent allusions to "measures of wine" and "reviving cordials," there is every reason to believe that the heroes and heroines were addicted to hard-drinking, which habit is bad enough at any time, but peculiarly hurtful when indulged in without taking a reasonable portion of food, as it speedily destroys the coats of the stomach, and induces a long train of dreadful disorders. Fair and amiable, therefore, as these heroes and heroines unquestionably were, they doubtless ultimately fell victims to the horrid vice of intemperance, notwithstanding the strength of their constitutions, which, it must be admitted, was extraordinary. From all that ever I could make out in these romances, the ladies, though described as fair and fragile beings which a summer wind would inevitably pulverize—a compound of unimaginable perfections and spiritual essences in white muslin—were able, according to the author, to endure more hardships and privations than a Highland drover, a North American Indian, or a Swedish soldier in Charles the Twelfth's time, and, like a Greenland bear, possessed wonderful capabilities for supporting nature for a long period without nutriment. In my unripe years when devouring the delectable pages of Anne of Swansea, or Francis Latham, the gifted author of "Midnight Horrors," and the "Black Forest," often have I marvelled when the young lady who was confined in an uninhabited part of the castle and had refused victuals for several days, was going to take her dinner. I used to reckon up how long it was since she had eaten anything, and draw conclusions from my own feelings, and this it was that first staggered my young faith in the truth of novels. When I had made calculations that she must be nearly starved to death, I found in the next chapter the old story over again—"an aged domestic entered and placed food before Almeida, from which she turned with loathing, and lost in a sense of her unparalleled situation, continued totally abstracted from all around," &c. Sometimes these heroines absolutely lived for a month on the smell of a boiled chicken; and when their prison doors were at last broken open, and one expected they would be found to be starved, squalid miserable-looking wretches, it was simply stated that they "never looked so lovely, confinement having imparted a delicate and melancholy tint to those cheeks which—" &c. As Hamlet says, "there is more in this than natural, if physicians could only find it out." What an invaluable wife would one of those ladies make for an Irish peasant after his potato crop had failed.

Walter Scott, (heaven bless him!) among his other worthy deeds, has revived the good old practice of eating and drinking upon paper. His personages, one and all, with the single exception of the earl of Glenallen, in the Antiquary, who made his dinner of vegetables and water! are capital feeders; they all eat with a relish, and seem to like what is set before them. There is something hearty in this, and people with good digestions think the better of them for it. Like sensible people they all do justice to good cheer whenever they meet with it; and really it is enough to give a person an appetite to read the account of honest Dandie Dinmont's attack on the round of cold beef, Waverly's breakfast in Donald Bean Lean's cave, or the description of the savoury stew prepared by Meg Merrilies in the kairn of Derncleugh, of which the worthy Donune partakes. It is characteristic of Shakspeare and Scott that they are fond of introducing familiar occurrences like these amid their most wild and romantic scenes, while feebler writers are afraid to do so for fear of destroying the effect, or rendering what is already tame or outrageous, ludicrous.

Of late there is a kind of puppyism sprung up in discoursing of eating; it was first generated by some of the petit maitre correspondents of the New Monthly Magazine, and has since been continued by Edward Lytton Bulwer's heroes, and others of a similar class. They discourse about the pleasures of the table in a style of superlative affectation, treat all solid joints as relics of ancient barbarism, and all who partake of them as vulgar and John Bullish, learn the names of a dozen or two French dishes, and make a parade of their love of, and familiarity with, soups, slops, stews, and kick-shaws, as weak, insipid, and unsubstantial as themselves. Puppyism in writing and dressing is bad enough, but puppyism on so solemn and serious a subject as eating, is carrying the jest a little too far.

THE PROPOSAL OF MARRIAGE.

A worthy young lover once sought for his bride,
A dame of the blue-stocking school;
"Excuse me, dear sir, but I've vowed," she replied,
"That I never would marry a fool!"

"Then think not of wedlock," he answered, "my fair,
Your vow was Diana's suggestion,
Since none but a fool, it is easy to swear,
Would venture to ask you the question!"

THE FAIR SEX.

When Eve brought us, to all mankind,
Old Adam called her woman;
But when she woo'd with love so kind,
He then pronounced it woo-man;
But now with folly and with pride,
Their husbands' pockets trimming,
The ladies are so full of whims,
The people call them whim-men.

The best religion is that which prompts us to a faithful and cheerful discharge of all our duties.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

PORTRAITS OF CELEBRATED CHARACTERS.

SIR WILLIAM HERSCHEL.

This eminent astronomer was born at Hanover in 1738. His father was a musician. At the age of fourteen he was placed in the band of the Hanoverian regiment of guards. About the year 1758 he proceeded with a detachment of his regiment to England, accompanied by his father, who after a short stay returned to his native country, leaving his son in England. For several years he obtained a subsistence by his musical talents, devoting his leisure hours to the study of the English and Italian languages; he also made some progress in the Greek and Latin. The bent of his inclination during the period was, however, principally directed to mathematics and astronomy; and frequently after a harassing day of fourteen or sixteen hours, occupied in his professional avocations, he would seek relaxation, if such it might be termed, in extending his knowledge in his favourite pursuits.

Having in the course of extensive reading made some discoveries which awakened his curiosity, he commissioned a friend in London to procure him a telescope of large dimensions, but the price being above his limited means, he resolved to construct one himself. After innumerable disappointments he completed a five feet Newtonian reflector. The success of his first attempt encouraged him to fresh efforts, and in a short time he made telescopes from seven to twenty feet. As a proof of his perseverance, it is said that in perfecting the object mirror for his seven feet instrument, he finished two hundred before he produced one that satisfactorily answered his purpose.

As his love for the study of astronomy increased, he gradually lessened his professional engagements, and in 1779 he commenced a regular review of the heavens, star by star. In the course of eighteen months' observations he remarked that a star, which had been recorded by former astronomers as a fixed star, was gradually changing its position; and after much attention he was enabled to ascertain that it was an undiscovered planet. He communicated the fact to the Royal Society, who elected him a fellow, and decreed him their annual gold medal. This great discovery he made on the thirteenth of March, 1781, and bestowed on the planet the name of Georgium Sidus, in compliment to the king, who in consequence of his merit settled on him a handsome salary, which enabled him to relinquish his professional occupations, and devote himself wholly to the study of astronomy.

He shortly afterwards fixed his permanent residence at Slough, near Windsor, where, in the hope of facilitating and extending his researches, he undertook to construct a telescope of forty feet, which was completed in 1787. With the aid of this ponderous instrument, assisted by others of more manageable size, he continued to enrich the stores of astronomical science. In these researches he was materially assisted by his sister, Miss Caroline Herschel, who was equally devoted to the study which has immortalized her brother.

In 1783 he announced the discovery of a volcanic mountain in the moon, and four years afterwards communicated the account of two other volcanoes in that orb, which appeared in a state of eruption. Showing these apparent eruptions at one time to a gentleman, the latter exclaimed, that he not only saw the fire but the smoke!

It would be impossible in a sketch like the present, and perhaps also superfluous to detail the many important discoveries which have been made by this great astronomer; they are well known to the scientific world. By his labours he is justly esteemed as the most celebrated man of his age. Various public bodies testified their respect for his talents, and his sovereign conferred on him the honour of knighthood.

He was distinguished for great amenity of manners, and a modesty peculiarly becoming in acknowledged genius. He is described as possessing much good humour in bearing with the intrusions of the country people in the neighbourhood, amongst whom his astronomical studies created a notion that he held mysterious converse with the stars. On one occasion, during a rainy summer, a farmer solicited his advice as to the proper time for cutting hay. The doctor pointed through a window to an adjoining meadow, in which lay a crop of grass utterly swamped, "Look at that field," said he, "and when I tell you it is mine, I think you will not need another proof to convince you that I am no more weather-wise than yourself, or the rest of my neighbours."

Sir William died on the twenty-third of August, 1822, leaving behind him an unblemished reputation in private life. His name will descend to posterity as one of the greatest astronomers of the age in which he lived.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE BLACK-MOSS.

IN TWO PARTS.—PART THE FIRST.

"'Tis only from the belief of the goodness and wisdom of a Supreme Being that our calamities can be borne in that manner which becomes a man."—Henry Mackenzie.

IN summer there is beauty in the wildest moors of Scotland, and the wayfaring man who sits down for an hour's rest beside some little spring that flows unheard through the brightened moss and water-cresses, feels his weary heart revived by the silent, serene, and solitary prospect. On every side sweet sunny spots of verdure smile towards him from among the melancholy heather—unexpectedly in the solitude a stray sheep, it may be with its lambs, starts half-alarmed at his motionless figure—insects large, bright, and beautiful come ca-reering by him through the desert air—nor does the wild want its own songsters, the gray linnet, fond of the blooming furze, and now and then the lark mounting up to heaven above the summits of the green pastoral hills. During such a sunshiny hour, the lonely cottage on the waste seems to stand in a paradise; and as he rises to pursue his journey, the traveller looks back and blesses it with a mingled emotion of delight and envy. There, thinks he, abide the children of innocence and contentment, the two most benign spirits that watch over human life.

But other thoughts arise in the mind of him who may chance to journey the same scene in the desolation of winter. The cold bleak sky girdles the moor as with a belt of ice—life is frozen in air and on earth. The silence is not of repose but extinction—and should a solitary human dwelling catch his eye, half buried in the snow, he is sad for the sake of them whose destiny it is to abide far from the cheerful haunts of men, shrouded up in melancholy, by poverty held in thrall, or pining away in unvisited and untended disease.

But, in good truth, the heart of human life is but imperfectly discovered from its countenance; and before we can know what the summer, or what the winter yields for enjoyment or trial to our country's peasantry, we must have conversed with them in their fields and by their firesides; and made ourselves acquainted with the powerful ministry of the seasons, not over those objects alone that feed the eye and the imagination, but over all the incidents, occupations, and events that modify or constitute the existence of the poor.

I have a short and simple story to tell of the winter-life of the moorland cottager—a story but of one evening—with few events and no signal catastrophe—but which may haply please those hearts whose delight it is to think on the humble under-plots that are carrying on in the great drama of life.

Two cottagers, husband and wife, were sitting by their cheerful peat-fire one winter evening, in a small lonely hut on the edge of a wide moor, at some miles distance from any other habitation. There had been, at one time, several huts of the same kind erected closely together, and inhabited by families of the poorest class of day-labourers who found work among the distant farms, and at night returned to dwellings which were rent free, with their little gardens won from the waste. But one family after another had dwindled away, and the turf-built huts had all fallen into ruins, except one that had always stood in the centre of this little solitary village, with its summer-walls covered with the richest honeysuckles, and in the midst of the brightest of all the gardens. It alone now sent up its smoke into the clear winter sky—and its little end window, now lighted up, was the only ground star that shone towards the belated traveller, if any such ventured to cross, on a winter night, a scene so dreary and desolate. The affairs of the small household were all arranged for the night. The little rough pony that had drawn in a sledge, from the heart of the Black-Moss, the fuel by whose blaze the cotters were now sitting cheerily, and the little highland cow, whose milk enabled them to live, were standing amicably together, under cover of a rude shed, of which one side was formed by the peat-stack, and which was at once byre and stable and hen-roost. Within the clock ticked cheerfully as the fire-light reached its old oak-wood case across the yellow-sanded floor—and a small round table stood between, covered with a snow-white cloth, on which were milk and oat-cakes, the morning, mid-day, and evening meal of these frugal and contented cotters. The spades and the mattocks of the labourer were collected into one corner, and showed that the succeeding day was the blessed sabbath—while on the wooden chimney-piece was seen lying an open Bible ready for family worship.

The father and the mother were sitting together, without opening their lips, but with their hearts overflowing with happiness, for on this Saturday night they were, every minute, expecting to hear at the latch the hand of their only daughter, a maiden of about fifteen years, who was living with a farmer over the hills. This dutiful child was, as they knew, to bring home to them "her sair-worn penny fee," a pittance which, in the beauty of her girlhood, she earned singing at her work, and which, in the benignity of that sinless time, she would pour with tears into the bosoms she so dearly loved. Forty shillings a year were all the wages of sweet Hannah Lee—but though she wore at her labour a tortoise-shell comb in her auburn hair, and though in the kirk none were more becomingly arrayed than she, one half, at least, of her earnings were to be reserved for the holiest of all purposes, and her kind innocent heart was gladdened when she looked on the little purse that was, on the long-expected Saturday night, to be taken from her bosom, and put, with a blessing, into the hand of her father, now growing old at his daily toils.

Of such a child the happy cotters were thinking in their silence. And well indeed might they be called happy. It is at that sweet season that filial piety is most beautiful. Their own Hannah had just outgrown the mere unthinking gladness of childhood, but had not yet reached that time when inevitable selfishness mixes with the pure current of love. She had begun to think on what her affectionate heart had felt so long; and when she looked on the pale face of her mother, on the deepening wrinkles and whitening hairs of her father, often would she lie weeping for their sakes on her midnight bed—and wish that she were beside them as they slept, that she might kneel down and kiss them, and mention their names over and over again in her prayer. The parents whom before she had only loved, her expanding heart now also venerated. With gushing tenderness was now mingled a holy fear and an awful reverence. She had discerned the relation in which she, an only child, stood to her poor parents now that they were getting old, and there was not a passage in scripture that spake of parents or of children, from Joseph sold into slavery, to Mary weeping below the cross, that was not written, never to be obliterated, on her uncorrupted heart.

The father rose from his seat, and went to the door to look out into the night. The stars were in thousands, and the full moon was risen. It was almost light as day, and the snow, that seemed encrusted with diamonds, was so hardened by the frost, that his daughter's homeward feet would leave no mark on its surface. He had been toiling all day among the distant Castle-woods, and stiff and wearied as he now was, he was almost tempted to go and meet his child—but his wife's kind voice dissuaded him, and returning to the fire-side, they began to talk of her whose image had been so long passing before them in their silence.

"She is growing up to be a bonny lassie," said the mother, "her long and weary attendance on me during my fever last spring kept her down awhile—but now she is sprouting fast and fair as a lily, and may the blessing of God be as dew and as sunshine to our sweet flower all the days she bloometh upon this earth."

"Ay, Agnes," replied the father, "we are not very old yet, though we are getting older—and a few years will bring her to woman's estate, and what thing on this earth, think ye, human or brute, would ever think of injuring her? Why I was speaking about her yesterday to the minister as he was riding by, and he told me that none answered at the examination in the kirk so well as Hannah. Poor thing—I well think she has all the Bible by heart—indeed, she has read but little else; only some stories, too true ones, of the blessed martyrs, and some o' the auld songs o' Scotland, in which there is nothing but what is good, and which, to be sure, she sings, God bless her, sweeter than any laverock."

"Ay, were we both to die this very night, she would be happy. Not that she would forget us, all the days of her life. But have you not seen, husband, that God always makes the orphan happy? None so little lonesome as they! They come to make friends o' all the bonny and sweet things in the world around them, and all the kind hearts in the world make friends o' them. They come to know that God is more especially the father o' them on earth whose parents he has taken up to heaven—and therefore it is that they for whom so many have fears, fear not at all for themselves, but go dancing and singing along like children whose parents are both alive! Would it not be so with our dear Hannah? So douce and thoughtful a child, but never sad nor miserable—ready it is true to shed tears for little, but as ready to dry them up and break out into smiles! I know not why it is, husband, but this night my heart warms towards her beyond usual. The moon and stars are at this moment looking down upon her, and she looking up to them, as she is glinting homewards over the snow. I wish she were but here, and taking the comb out o' her bonny hair and letting it all fall down in clusters before the fire, to melt away the cranreuch!"

While the parents were thus speaking of their daughter, a loud sigh of wind came suddenly over the cottage, and the leafless ash-tree under whose shelter it stood, creaked and groaned dismally as it passed by. The father started up, and going again to the door, saw that a sudden change had come over the face of the night. The moon had nearly disappeared, and was just visible in a dim, yellow glimmering den in the sky. All the remote stars were obscured, and only one or two faintly seemed in a sky that half an hour before was perfectly cloudless, but that was now driving with rack and mist, and sleet, the whole atmosphere being in commotion. He stood for a single moment to observe the direction of this unforeseen storm, and then hastily asked for his staff.

"I thought I had been more weather-wise; a storm is coming down from the Cairnbrae-hawse, and we shall have nothing but a wild night."

He then whistled on his dog—an old sheep-dog, too old for its former labours—and set off to meet his daughter, who might then, for aught he knew, be crossing the Black-moss. The mother accompanied her husband to the door, and took a long frightened look at the angry sky. As she kept gazing, it became still more terrible. The last shred of blue was extinguished—the wind went whirling in roaring eddies, and great flakes of snow circled about in the middle air, whether drifted up from the ground, or driven down from the clouds, the fear-stricken mother knew not; but she at least knew, that it seemed a night of danger, despair, and death.

"Lord have mercy on us, James, what will become of our poor hairn?"

But her husband heard not her words, for he was already out of sight in the snow storm, and she was left to the terror of her own soul in that lonesome cottage.

Little Hannah Lee had left the farmer's house soon as the rim of the great moon was seen by her eyes, that had been long anxiously watching it from the window, rising, like a joyful dream, over the gloomy mountain-tops; and all by herself she tripped along beneath the beauty of the silent heaven. Still as she kept ascending and descending the knolls that lay in the bosom of the glen, she sung to herself a song, a hymn, or a psalm, without the accompaniment of the streams, now all silent in the frost; and ever and anon she stopped to try to count the stars that lay in some more beautiful part of the sky, or gazed on the constellations that she knew, and called them, in her joy, by the names they bore among the shepherds. There were none to hear her voice, or see her smiles, but the ear and eye of Providence. As she glided, and took her looks from heaven, she saw her own little fireside—her parents waiting for her arrival—the Bible opened for worship—her own little room kept so neatly for her, with its mirror hanging by the window, in which to braid her hair by the morning light—her bed prepared for her by her mother's hand—the primroses in her garden peeping through the snow—old Tray, who ever welcomed her home with his dim white eyes—the pony and the cow—friends all, and inmates of that happy household. So stepped she along, while the snow-diamonds glittered around her feet, and the frost wove a wreath of lucid pearls around her forehead.

She had now reached the edge of the Black-moss, which lay half way between the farmer's and her father's dwelling, when she heard a loud noise coming down Glen-Scrae, and in a few seconds she felt on her face some flakes of snow. She looked up the glen, and saw the snow storm coming down, fast as a flood. She felt no fears, but she ceased her song; and had there been a human eye to look upon her there, it might have seen a shadow on her face. She continued her course, and felt bolder and bolder every step that brought her nearer to her parents' house. But the snow storm had now reached the Black-moss, and the broad line of light that had lain in the direction of her home, was soon swallowed up, and the child was in utter darkness. She saw nothing but the flakes of snow, interminably intermingled, and furiously wafted in the air, close to her head; she heard nothing but one wild, fierce, fitful howl. The cold became intense, and her little feet and hands were fast being numb into insensibility.

"It is a fearful change," muttered the child to herself, but still she did not fear, for she had been born in a moorland cottage, and had lived all her days among the hardships of the hills. "What will become of the poor sheep?" thought she—but still she scarcely thought of her own danger, for innocence, and youth, and joy, are slow to think of aught evil be-falling themselves, and thinking benignly of all living things, forget their own fear in their pity of others' sorrow. At last she could no longer discern a single mark on the snow, either of human steps or of sheep-track, or the footprint of a wild-fowl. Suddenly, too, she felt out of breath and exhausted—and shedding tears for herself, at last sunk down in the snow.

It was now that her heart began to quake with fear. She remembered stories of shepherds lost in the snow—of a mother and child frozen to death on that very moor—and, in a moment, she knew that she was to die. Bitterly did the poor child weep, for death was terrible to her, who, though poor, enjoyed the bright little world of youth and innocence. The skies of heaven were dearer than she knew to her—so were the flowers of earth. She had been happy at her work, happy in her sleep, happy in the kirk on the Sabbath. A thousand thoughts had the solitary child; and in her own heart was a spring of happiness, pure and undisturbed as any fount that sparkles unseen all the year through in some quiet nook among the pastoral hills. But now there was to be an end of all this; she was to be frozen to death—and lie there till the thaw might come; and then her father would find her body, and carry it away to be buried in the kirk-yard.

The tears were frozen on her cheeks as soon as shed—and scarcely had her little hands strength to clasp themselves together, as the thought of an over-ruling and merciful Lord came across her heart. Then, indeed, the fears of this religious child were calmed, and she heard without terror the plover's wailing cry, and the deep boom of the bittorn sounding in the moss. "I will repeat the Lord's prayer;" and drawing her plaid more closely around her, she whispered, beneath its ineffectual cover; "Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name—thy kingdom come—thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." Had human aid been within fifty yards, it could have been of no avail—eye could not see her—ear could not hear her in that howling darkness. But that low prayer was heard in the centre of eternity—and that little sinless child was lying in the snow, beneath the all-seeing eye of God.

The maiden having prayed to her Father in heaven, then thought of her father on earth. Alas! they were not far separated. The father was lying but a short distance from his child. He too had sunk down in the drifting snow, after having, in less than an hour, exhausted all the strength of fear, pity, hope, despair, and resignation, that could rise in a father's heart blindly seeking to rescue his only child from death, thinking that one desperate exertion might enable them to perish in each other's arms. There they lay, within a stone's throw of each other, while a huge snow-drift was every moment piling itself up into a more insurmountable barrier between the dying parent and his dying child.

There was all this while a blazing fire in the cottage—a white spread table—and beds prepared for the family to lie down in peace. Yet was she who sat therein more to be pitied than the old man and the child stretched upon the snow.

"I will not go to seek them—that would be tempting Providence—and wilfully putting out the lamp of life. No! I will abide here, and pray for them!"

Then, as she knelt down, looked she at the useless fire burning away so cheerfully, when all she loved might be dying of cold—and unable to bear the thought, she shrieked out a prayer, as if she might pierce the sky up to the very throne of God, and send with it her own miserable soul to plead before him for the delivery of her child and husband. She then fell down in blessed forgetfulness of all trouble, in the midst of the solitary cheerfulness of that bright burning hearth—and the Bible, which she had been trying to read in the pauses of her agony, remained clasped in her hands.

A CONNECTICUT PEDLER.

There is not a more curious specimen of human nature in existence, than the genuine Connecticut pedler. He is a cheat to be sure—but he cheats with so much apparent honesty, that you never know it till he is beyond hail; and even then you hardly know whether to be angry or to laugh outright at your own gullibility. You mentally resolve never again to have dealings with gentlemen of his description; and yet ten chances to one, but that the very next travelling merchant from the "land of steady habits" will work his way into your good graces, and leave you more essentially over-reached, than even his brother in the trade had done before him.

The genuine pedler has a variety of characters in which he disguises himself like the masquers at the theatre. He changes oftener than the fabled chameleon, at least to outward appearance, while at heart he is always the same,—cool, calculating, and crafty. He invariably adapts himself to the character of those around him; and he is seldom at a loss to ascertain the nature of this character. In physiognomy he is a perfect adept—an improvement upon Lavater himself. In acuteness and penetration he has no equal. If he finds himself among religious customers, he is the very personification of piety. Like his great prototype, the arch deceiver himself, he can "quote scripture to his purpose;" and while employed in murdering some pious and goodly hymn in desperate attempts at psalmody, he passes off with the utmost ease upon his credulous hearers, his cracked tin pails and wooden nutmegs. If he finds his next customer a boisterous son of conviviality, and a scoffer at every thing save the "good liquor" which he idolizes, the mask of religion is at once thrown off—the whine of puritanism gives place to the bold and swaggering manner, which he finds in such company is the surest passport to favour and confidence.

He has always on hand a fund of anecdote and information. He can talk on all subjects with equal volubility. He seldom or never takes up his abode at an inn, or place of public entertainment; for he always calculates on exchanging his wares for board and lodging. He delights to seat himself at the farmer's fireside. There he has something to say for the edification or amusement of all his auditors. To the old gentleman many a marvellous legend to rehearse, of enormous pumpkins, of over-grown cattle, and onions a yard in diameter. He has much important information for the good woman of the house, respecting the brewing of her table beer, the management of her poultry, and the best remedies for colds. For the younger portions of the family he has the quaint anecdote and the marvellous legend. He tells the young Miss of beaux and Connecticut fashions; and withal wins upon the confidence and good graces of the whole family. Morning arrives, and after breakfast is disposed of, the pedler unlocks the repository of his stock in trade. The lady of the house is supplied with a pair of spectacles, whose iron bows have been plated over with silver, and are in consequence passed off as entirely composed of the precious metal. The old gentleman is coaxed into the purchase of a razor, which like that of Dr. Wolcott, was "made to sell;" but which could no more answer its ostensible purpose, than a hand saw.

The pretty young Miss is flattered into a bargain for a pair of ear-rings, which conclusively prove the truth of the maxim, that "all is not gold which glitters." And then with a flattering farewell on his part, and a kind request to "call again" on the part of the family, the honest itinerant again takes up his line of march, eager to reap another harvest of gain, at another unsuspecting fireside.

Essex Gazette.

HABITS OF SHEEP.

Sheep perseveringly follow their leader wherever he goes. Of this singular disposition Dr. Anderson informs us he once witnessed an instance in the town of Liverpool. A butcher's boy was driving about twenty fat wethers through the town; but they ran down a street along which he did not want them to go. He observed a scavenger at work with his broom a little way before them, and called out loudly for him to stop the sheep. The man accordingly did what he could to turn them back, running from side to side, always opposing himself to their passage, and brandishing his broom with great dexterity, but the sheep, much agitated, pressed forward, and at last one of them came right up to the man, who, fearing it was about to jump over his head, whilst he was stooping, grasped the broomstick in both hands, and held it over his head. He stood for a few seconds in this position, when the sheep made a spring and jumped fairly over him, without touching the broom. The first had no sooner cleared this impediment, than another followed, and another in quick succession, that the man, perfectly confounded, seemed to lose all recollection, and stood in the same attitude till the whole had jumped over him, not one of them attempting to pass on either side, though the street was quite clear.

MRS. HENRY SIDDONS.

We perceive by the Edinburgh papers, that Mrs. Henry Siddons, better known to the London public as Miss Murray, bade adieu to the stage on Monday last. She appeared as Lady Townley; and at the close of the play, delivered a farewell address, composed for the occasion by Sir Walter Scott. We cannot resist the temptation of paying to her merits the passing tribute of our admiration. Her professional talents are unquestionably of the highest kind, while her manners and accomplishments would grace any station in life. Neither in tragedy or comedy can the metropolitan boards boast of an actress who approaches her in excellence. The delicacy and truth of her conceptions of character were worthy of the power with which they were embodied. Her voice is of the deepest and most touching beauty, and she knows well how to avail herself of the resources with which it invests her.

Mrs. Henry Siddons rose to celebrity at a time when the most brilliant talents graced the stage; her loss would then have been great; at present it is irreparable. At the termination of the play on Monday night Mrs. Siddons came forward, led by her brother. She was received, as may be imagined, in the most enthusiastic manner, and repeated the address, which was as follows:

The curtain drops—the mimic scene is past—
One word remains, the saddest and the last;
A word which oft in careless mood we say,
When parting friends have passed a social day:
As oft pronounced in agony of heart,
When friends must sever, or when lovers part;
Or o'er the dying couch in whispers spoken,
When the last tender thread is all but broken.
When all that ear can list or tongue can tell
Are the faint mournful accents, fare-yewell!
Yet ere we part—and even now a tear
Bedims my eye to think our parting near—
Fain would I speak how deeply in my breast
Will the remembrance of your kindness rest—
Fain would I tell—but words are cold and weak;
It is the heart, the heart alone can speak.
The wanderer may rejoice to view once more
The smiling aspect of her native shore;
Yet oft, in mingled dreams of joy and pain,
She'd think she sees this beautiful land again;
And then, as now, will fond affection trace
The kindness that endeared her dwelling-place.
Now, then, it must be said, though from my heart
The mournful accents scarcely will depart,
Lingering, as if they feared to break some spell—
It must be uttered!—friends, kind friends, farewell!
One suit remains: you will not scorn to hear
The last my lips shall falter on your ear;
When I am far, my patrons, oh! be kind
To the dear relative I leave behind.
He is your own, and like yourselves may claim
A Scottish origin—a Scottish name.
His opening talents—let the truth be told,
A sister in a brother's cause is bold—
Shall cater for your eye of leisure still,
With equal ardour, and improving skill.
And though too oft the poor performer's lot
Is but to bloom, to fade, and be forgot,
Whene'er the mimic sceptre they resign—
A gentler destiny I feel is mine;
For, as the brother moves before your eyes,
Some memory of the sister must arise;
And in your hearts a kind remembrance dwell,
Of her who once again sighs forth—farewell!

In the delivery of this address Mrs. Siddons was often interrupted by loud applause; and at its conclusion the audience in the boxes and pit stood up, and accompanied her exit by shouts and waving of hats and handkerchiefs. Edinburgh Cour.

HINTS TO MOTHERS.

In my intercourse with mothers I have noticed particularly their various methods of family government, and the errors to which they are most liable. I believe that most of them may be traced to a want of patience. While the judicious mother is laudably anxious that her children should imbibe right feelings and dispositions, she should recollect that during the first five or six years of their lives, when impressions are always the deepest and most permanent, they are preparing their little code of morals and forming their habits of action, not so much from her precepts as her example. She should therefore look well to her own conduct, and while she is endeavouring to educate them, let her beware that she neglect not herself. Let her examine her own disposition, and if that is irritable and impatient, let her take heed that it does not betray itself in her intercourse with her children. With them all should be calmness and consistency; nothing should appear to be the result of passion or caprice. They should always be able to see that their parent has a reason for the course of conduct she pursues. Those parents who are always complaining of the stubbornness and ill-humour of their children, may depend upon it the fault lies more with themselves than they are aware, or would be willing to acknowledge. The mother is perhaps hurried and oppressed with the cares of her family, and a child commits some fault, which perhaps at any other time would have only elicited a slight reprimand, but now she rebukes it in terms entirely disproportioned to the offence, and the child becomes angry and turbulent, for he feels as if rebuked, not for doing wrong, but for giving his mother trouble; not for the offence he has committed, but for his mother's want of patience to bear with it; and he consequently sees not his own fault, but that of his parent. For myself I never detect a fault in a child, or have occasion to punish one, without examining myself with the most scrutinizing severity, lest there should be something in my example to foster the fault I am so anxious to eradicate from my child.

INFLUENCE OF MUSIC ON THE COMMON MOUSE.

The following circumstance was communicated to the late Dr. Cramer of Virginia, by a gentleman of undoubted veracity:—One evening, in the month of December, as a few officers on board of a British man-of-war, in the harbour of Portsmouth, were seated around the fire, one of them began to play a plaintive air on the violin. He had scarcely performed ten minutes when a mouse, apparently frantic, made its appearance in the centre of the floor, near the large table which usually stands in the wardroom, the residence of the lieutenants in ships of the line. The strange gestures of the little animal strongly excited the attention of the officers, who, with one consent, resolved to suffer it to continue its singular actions unmolested. Its exertions now appeared to be greater every moment. It shook its head, leaped about the table, and exhibited signs of the most ecstatic delight.

It was observed, that in proportion to the gradation of the tones to the soft point, the ecstasy of the animal appeared to be increased, and vice versa. After performing actions which an animal so diminutive would, at first sight, seem incapable of, the little creature, to the astonishment of the delighted spectators, suddenly ceased to move; fell down and expired, without evincing any symptoms of pain.

MANNERS.

What a rare gift is that of manners! how difficult to define—how much more difficult to impart. Better for a man to possess them, than wealth, beauty, or talent; they will more than supply all. No attention is too minute, no labour too exaggerated, which tends to perfect them. He who enjoys their advantages in the highest degree, viz. he who can please, penetrate, persuade, as the object may require, possesses the subtlest secret of the diplomatist and the statesman, and wants nothing but opportunity to become "great." Pelham.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

It is stated, from time to time, in the public journals, that the taste of the inhabitants of this city in acting and music is improving, rapidly—wonderfully—astonishingly, and the said worthy inhabitants are apt to compliment each other on the strength of these good-natured, though rather warm and premature assertions. That a material change has taken place is evident, for the style of acting and singing which four or five years ago was looked upon as superlatively grand, and as something with which people must of necessity be delighted, is now regarded as worse than bad: yet cases do occasionally occur which would lead an observer to suppose that that many-headed monster the public was at times altogether devoid of taste and discrimination. Last week, for instance, that excellent comic actor Hilson took his benefit, and was as usual neglected, in consequence of adhering to the "legitimate drama," in place of resorting to the vulgar and disreputable clap-traps, commonly placed before the gaping public on such occasions. He was at the expense of reviving the "Winter's Tale," and of engaging the first singer in the country to add to its effect; yet, would it be believed, Shakspeare, Hilson, and Mrs. Austin failed to draw together more than three or four hundred people, while on the same evening the amphitheatre was crowded in every part to see the living skeleton ride round a sawdust ring on the back of an overgrown bullock? Wonderful evidences of taste, when a thin man and a fat ox are ten times as attractive as poetry and music. It is very hard indeed for Mr. Hilson to be thus unworthily deserted on his benefit night by a public whom he has amused and delighted for many years. But so it is.—We see it announced, at the time of writing this, that Clara Fisher will once more gladden the eyes of the playgoers of this city. It is to be expected that the brains of divers inflammatory young men will be seriously affected on the occasion, and that much poetry will be committed. For our own part, we will not have an opportunity of being guilty of any extravagance, as this will probably be the last notice of New-York theatricals that we shall pen for many months. Whatever our past strictures may have been worth in other respects, we can at least say that they have been made without "love or fear—favour or affection." Our conscience only reproves us for one thing, and that is, having barely done justice to the good qualities of our worthy friend Richings. He is a useful and improving actor, and Mr. Simpson might "better spare a better man." In extravagant fops, or in such parts as Finnikin in Don Giovanni, or the Hon. Dick Trifle, Richings is very amusing and superior to any one in the theatre. We were never sensible how valuable he was in these and similar characters, until we saw others attempt them. Let Mr.

Richings only eschew very deep tragedy and love songs, and beware that his partiality for sylvan colours does not seduce him into an inordinate use of green vestments, and we have no doubt that he will rise rapidly in his profession. The theatre and all connected with it have our farewell wishes for their prosperity. C.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

In addition to those stated in our last number, we have effected another arrangement which we feel the greatest pleasure in announcing to our subscribers. The inimitable essays recently published in the Mirror, under the signature of C. have excited universal admiration, and we confidently recommend them to the perusal of all lovers of good writing, with the assurance that they will amply repay perusal. We have engaged the author of these sketches, WILLIAM COX, Esq., to devote his time entirely to this publication. He will immediately proceed to London for the purpose of establishing a foreign correspondence, by which, as we shall hear from him frequently, we are enabled to promise our readers a rich fund of amusement drawn from the most interesting sources. The superior advantages which we shall hereafter possess, must be so obvious to all that we refrain from comment.

Byron, Moore, and Lady Byron.—Mr. Moore is not fortunate in his prose attempts. His Epicurean, indeed, was excellent of its kind—but after that you have said all. His Life of Sheridan was deemed too turgid, his Captain Rock too inflammatory, and his Notices of the Life of his friend Byron scarcely any one praises who has patiently waded through it. It is altogether an unsatisfactory performance—too much mystified in one place, and too palpably candid in another. The eye of the curious reader would fain glance at some object behind the curtain, some untold incident of which the narrative consigned to ruthless destruction would have afforded a deeper insight into the real character of the noble bard. It was a truly injudicious, nay, an unpardonable error, to destroy records which might have thrown light on subjects that may now remain enveloped in total and enduring darkness. It is difficult likewise to conjecture a motive sufficiently strong to excuse the act which committed them to the flames. They could not have thrown out the character of Byron into a more bold relief of infamy than has been attempted by his relentless and cold-hearted persecutors—and, if they would have implicated others now living, we are free to assert our unhesitating belief that some palliation for his alleged crimes, some mitigation of the condign punishment to which even his memory seems doomed by his foes in the award of public opinion, might have been obtained. It was due to him, and late events have fully shown would have been just conduct towards his detractors. It is not our intention to insinuate that Byron was not criminal—was not the slave of direful passions, of a sour misanthropy, and an unpardonable egotism. He was so, and that most miserably; and most keenly, most agonizingly did he pay the penalty of his crime—he was a wretch. Success the most unbounded, applause the most gratifying and soothing, nay, worship the most idolatrous of his own inimitable genius—all could not reach his heart—"I have not loved the world, nor the world me!"

Can any infliction, the most ingeniously devised of the most cruel tortures, rack, pincers and all, equal the intensity of mental suffering under which a heart of sensibility must have writhed with such a feeling ever gnawing at its core? But now he is dead—his personal example, poisonous as it may have been thought, has been withdrawn, and his spirit has fled to answer a better and more searching Judge than the wavering opinion of the world. And now the impression of his mighty intellect alone remains to witness unto posterity that he was here. And now a charitable heart would feel, and a prudent mind would hope, that his errors would have been covered by the mantle of oblivion. Those individuals more especially who are identified with his name, were called upon by every consideration of propriety for the living, and decent, however cold, regard for the dead, to spare the memory of his evil deeds. His child—his "Ada, sole daughter of his house and heart," should have been respected—but no, the slightest implication—the least doubt, is sufficient to elicit statements and exposures which, if they are dishonouring to the illustrious dead—for illustrious Byron must be in spite of his crimes—reflect no credit on the magnanimity, or the forbearance, or the sexual modesty of his living accuser. It is needless to pursue the subject farther. The public may be induced more and more to deprecate the vices of the man—the genius of his poetry will ever command their admiration and idolatry—his master mind is destined to rank in the same niche with Shakspeare and Milton, Pope and Dryden.

Ladies on Horseback.—There never was a law enacted from the days of Solon which had half the influence over mankind which fashion daily and hourly exercises. Ay—and over womankind too. A few years ago, and our ancient honest burgomasters would have started in horror at the sight of a lady gaily attired, and reining a prancing charger. Now we glow with rapture as we see the most accomplished and graceful daughters of our city riding with ease and pleasure on our most frequented avenues. As a promoter and preservative of health, and as a fashionable and becoming accomplishment, there is none that deserves general adoption more than exercise on horseback. All the medical journals and the medical practitioners of note unite in its recommendation. It is worth all the anti-dyspeptic nostrums in the world.

Franklin Buildings.—This name has been given to the lofty and spacious range of edifices lately erected in Ann-street, between Broadway and Nassau-street, to a prominent corner of which the office of the New-York Mirror has recently been removed. For beauty of appearance, and convenience of arrangement, this pile of buildings probably surpasses any similar local improvement ever attempted in this city. It is due to the enterprise of Mr. James Conner, and is a decisive evidence of the superiority of individual exertion over that of the public authorities. The corporation have been years and years intending to remove the jail and bridewell—nay, while this stupendous work has been actually accomplished, that honourable body have been engaged in deliberating about a town-clock, and they have not yet finished the cupola which is to receive it! By the way, the side of Ann-street opposite the Franklin Buildings is the property of our worthy Recorder—may we cherish the hope that his ardour will receive a stimulus, and induce him to emulate the example of his public-spirited neighbour?

Miss Sterling.—We have before invited the attention of the public to the superior accomplishments and eminent skill of this meritorious and esteemed professor of the pianoforte. Whoever has listened to her performances in public, and availed himself of the advantages of her unsurpassed method of instruction in private, has borne cheerful testimony to the unexaggerated truth of our commendation. In addition to her claims as a successful teacher, she commands herself to general admiration by her unexceptionable and amiable deportment in the domestic walks of life. A favourable opportunity will soon be offered to her friends and the public of evincing their liberal sense of her worth by patronising a concert which we understand she intends, in consequence of repeated solicitations, very shortly to announce. We give this timely notice that none may fail to attend who feel, like ourselves, inclined to encourage the efforts of industrious and meritorious artists.

Holland's Cottage.—Those who are in the occasional habit of riding out of town, will be pleased to learn that there has been fitted up in a most healthy and elevated site, on the Third Avenue, a beautiful, and well supplied retreat, with the above designation. We accidentally stopped there a few days since, and were delighted with the neatness and comfort which presided over the establishment. Even our temperance men can be accommodated, for there is plenty of exquisite coffee. The grounds are so disposed that amusements of the most delightful and varied kinds may be enjoyed, bracing the health and whiling away the time. We observed numbers of ladies recreating themselves in all the exuberance of animal spirits, and rendered still more lovely by the surrounding charms of nature and the healthful breezes sweeping up from the noble river beneath.

Repository of the Arts.—Bourne truly deserves, and undoubtedly receives extensive encouragement for his indefatigable efforts to establish in this city a valuable public repository of specimens of the fine arts. It is a treat to stroll through his rooms, richly decorated with paintings and engravings of the first class. To ladies more especially an hour's lounge will furnish ample opportunities of exercising and improving their taste in the manufacture of light articles fit to adorn the boudoir or drawing-room.

Emporium and True American.—This well conducted paper, published weekly at Trenton, New Jersey, has lately been enlarged and much improved in its external appearance. We are ever pleased to witness gradual and substantial advances made by our contemporaries. They are at once tokens of skill, talent, and industry on the part of the editor, and of liberality, punctuality, and discernment on that of the public.

Clara Fisher.—This universal favourite appeared on Wednesday evening at the Park theatre, before a brilliant audience, who received her with the warmest tokens of their continued favour. We regret she can play but two nights.

THE DAYS OF OLD ROMANCE.

COMPOSED BY J. BARNETT.

ANDANTINO CON MOTO.

"Tis sweet when twilight's parting beam, O'er ocean's breast is cast, To picture in a waking dream, The glories of the past; To see a young and gallant knight, Array'd with shield and lance, Kneel down before his lady bright, In days of old romance. Kneel down before his lady bright, In days of old romance.

2d—"Tis sweet, when countless stars appear, To revel on the main, In every fife and drum to hear, Tradition's fairy strain; And mark some ancient minstrel stand, With song illumined glance, Who struck the harp with joyous hand, In days of old romance.

VARIETIES.

FEMALE REVENGE.—During the reign of Philip II. of Spain, a gentleman had the misfortune to kill his adversary in a nocturnal rencontre in the streets of Madrid. As he was leaning against the door he perceived, to his astonishment, a brilliant light in the church. He had sufficient courage to advance towards the light, but was seized with inexpressible horror at the sight of a female figure, clothed in white, which ascended from one of the vaults, holding a bloody knife in her hand. "What do you want here?" cried she, with a wild look, and a harsh threatening tone, as she approached him. The poor man who, before she spoke, had taken her for an apparition, quivered in every limb, and related his adventure without any reserve. "You are in my power," replied she, "but you have nothing to fear from me. I am a murderer like yourself. I belong to a family of distinction; a base and perjured man has ruined me, and boasted over my weakness and credulity. His life has paid the forfeit of his guilt. But this sacrifice was not sufficient for betrayed and insulted love. I bribed the sexton—I have been down into his vault—I have rent his false heart out of his body—and thus I serve the heart of a traitor." With these words she tore it in pieces with both hands, and then trampled it under her foot.

DIDEROT.—It is related of the celebrated Diderot that, on rising one morning, he found himself without a single sou, or the means of obtaining the smallest nourishment. After wandering about all day, and suffering the severest pangs of hunger, he returned to his inn, where his illness (arising from exhaustion) becoming apparent to his landlady, she gave him a little wine and some toasted bread. "That day," said he, afterwards, "I swore, if I ever possessed any thing, never to refuse an indigent person's request, that I might not be instrumental to their passing so dreadful a day as I had done," and which oath he is said to have most rigidly observed.

A beggar died recently at Lucca, who was known by the appellation of the butter-pot man, because he had nothing but that sort of earthen vessel in his hut. At his death more than seventy thousand francs in gold and silver were found in the pots!

Mr. Kellermann, a native of Mentz, has invented a machine at Moscow, by means of which he cures stammering in the space of three days. It is said the emperor has granted him a patent for six years, and made him a present of ten thousand roubles.

The following paragraphs are copied from the National Gazette.

The old Count de Segur has published a life of Louis XI. On the eighth of April, in the gallery of Diana, in the palace of the Tuilleries, the king of France washed the feet of thirteen children, who represented the thirteen apostles; and served each of them with bread and a little pitcher of wine. He was assisted, says the court paper, in his pious functions, by the Dauphin and the great dignitaries.

The first authentic account of the introduction of free masons into England as a body is in the year 674, when Hexham Church was built by the celebrated Wilfred, Archbishop of York.

John Wilson, of London, has produced a picture entitled, "carrying out an anchor," which is declared to equal any picture of its class, ancient or modern.

The Rev. George Croly has undertaken a complete history of the Jews in ancient and modern times.

The formal reception of the French poet M. de Lamartine into the Academy, took place at Paris on the second of April. Nothing could exceed the eagerness of the Parisian ladies to obtain seats.

Twelve thousand francs were lately paid by a bookseller of Paris for the manuscript of a dramatic piece, "Stockholm et Fontainebleau."

Shylock has fully succeeded as a melo-drama, in Paris, at the theatre de la Porte Saint-Martin. All Shakspeare's plays succeed every where in some shape or other.

Colonel Childs has finished a lithographic portrait of the late Dr. Godman, from a strong likeness of that lamented and celebrated person.

Virtue is no enemy to pleasure, grandeur, or glory; her proper office is to regulate our desires, that we may enjoy every blessing with moderation, and lose them without discontent.

CONUNDRUMS.—Why would a Frenchman say that an inferior singer at the opera was an indecent character? Because he is always in de chorus—indecorous.

Why is a boxer like a man who deals in flour? Because he is a miller.

Why is a man closing a letter like the top of a room? Because he is a sealing—ceiling.

Why should you never trust a little girl who can tell you how many feet she has got? Because she can count her feet—counterfeit.

GEORGE F. MORRIS, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

Published every Saturday, at the corner of Nassau and Ann streets.—Terms four dollars per annum, payable in advance.—No subscription received for a less period than one year.

J. SEYMOUR, PRINTER, JOHN-STREET.

Digitized by Google

NEW-YORK MIRROR.

AND LADIES' LITERARY GAZETTE.

VOLUME VII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 19, 1830.

NUMBER 50.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

LINES ON THE DEPARTURE OF SPRING.

Thou hast passed with all thy gifts away, thou pure and perfect spring,
As eagles vanish in the sky on sun illumined wing;
And from the earth, and from the sea, thy smiles have flown too soon,
Loved and lamented in their death, though harbingers of June,
For thou hadst sweet unfolding buds and blossoms, where the gale
Was prone to linger, and to play, on upland or in vale;
And cherished thoughts that come to bless no season but thine own,
When youth is pictured in thy reign, and in thy glance made known.

Thou hast passed with all thy vernal sprays, and with the streams unbound
That ran and leapt in gladness through the emerald-painted ground,
That wake the spirit's questioning, to which the fields reply
And tell of long-sought happiness to the inquiring eye.
Thou hast faded from our vision like a western cloud in air,
A cloud begirt with sunset—a fading thing and fair—
And with the years beyond the flood hath passed thy tender reign,
Thy smiles have vanished from the sky, the upland, and the plain.

Yet I mourn not that thy glory is made so frail a thing—
Nor that thy birds were visitants upon a transient wing;
For melting into "leafy June," thy span was like the sky
Which at the morn is beautiful, and bright when noon is nigh;
And when in golden billows the harvest fields shall roll,
And yellow corn-leaves rustle in the free wind's glad control,
I shall not sigh, when thou hast left so many scenes unwon—
So many cheerful aspects spread beneath the pleasant sun! EVERARD.

THE POWER OF MUSIC.

Music! thy spell is thrown
Round our dear firesides, o'er the festal hall
The house of prayer, the field of death—yea, all
Thy magic influence own!
Even in the early hour of infancy
Thy spell breathes in the mother's lullaby.

'Tis youth's enthusiast heart,
Which answers soonest to thy witching tone;
But not to animated youth alone

Dost thou thy charm impart,
Childhood, and even age bend to thy sway,
And manhood doth thy thrilling voice obey.

Hark! 'tis the trumpet's peal!
And marshalled thousands own the stirring tone,
And though it be to death, rush fiercely on;
And the harsh clang of steel,
And thrilling war-cry answer to its blast—
Thus on the battle field thy spell is cast!

List! 'tis the organ's sound!
And as it swells, hundreds of voices raise,
Blended in one rich sound, the hymn of praise;
And the same awe profound
Steals o'er each heart as swells the inspiring tone,
'Till all those various bosoms beat as one.

'Tis the harp's silver tone,
And the sweet breathings of the mellow flute—
What stills the laugh, why is each bright lip mute?

Mem'ries of days long gone
Those strains awake, a note in every heart
Is touched, and buried thoughts to being start.

One veils his drooping brow,
That strain recalls the friend of other years—
Another's downcast eye is charged with tears;
Scenes loved long, long ago
Rise now before him, when that air was breathed
By lips now cold, which then with smiles were wreathed.

Who hath not known the strain
To which, however life might change its hue,
One chord within his heart was ever true,
Which wakened joy or pain,
Or some deep feeling, strange and undefined;
Memories which flashed like lightning o'er the mind?

THYRA.

STANZAS.

To others give thy brightest smiles,
But keep thy tears for me.—Moore.

Yes, I have "kept my tears for thee,"
Forgetful as thou art;
Hadst thou e'er need of sympathy,
And my tears flowed not fast and free,
Warm from a faithful heart?

Perhaps they did in secret flow,
For I am not as those Whose transient feelings briefly show
Like traces on the sun-lit snow,
Or dew upon the rose.

When I have known thy heart oppress,
Harassed, and wrung by care,
My own has bade adieu to rest,
And every sigh that heaved thy breast,
Found answering echo there.

And many an hour, when others slept,
My tears have fallen for thee,

And none have asked me why I wept,
For silence my heart's portals kept,
And thought alone was free.

And tears from feeling's fount have sprung
At friendly words of thine,
While on my lips no answer hung,
For thoughts that dwell not on the tongue,
The treasuring heart enshrine.

Hadst thou the will, or power to cast
Away all thought of me,
Thou know'st the memory of the past,
Long as the throb of life shall last,
Would keep my tears for thee.

ISIDORA.

POPULAR TALES.

LOVE AND PISTOLS.

THE winter after I took possession of my estate, I went to Bath with my mother, who introduced me to Julia Faulkner, a lovely girl with an independent fortune of thirty thousand pounds: she was extremely amiable and well informed, and I paid her as much attention as my constitutional timidity would allow me. It was evident that a more intimate connexion between us was desired by our respective parents, and I little doubt but in the course of time I should have mustered courage to propose for her, and I doubt as little that I should have been accepted. A confoundedly tall Irish colonel, however, with black whiskers, and a most ferocious aspect, appeared on the scene, and became, as well as myself, the constant attendant of Julia. But what chance had I with a fellow of his appearance, profession, and impudence? His loquacity obliged me to sit in their presence as silent as a statue: or if I ventured to make a remark, he was sure to interrupt me before I could utter a sentence. If I secured her scarf to insure myself the pleasure of covering her ivory shoulders, he would take it from me with the utmost coolness, and praise my attention to the ladies. I had once seated her in my cabriolet for a drive, and was about to follow her, when the colonel rode up on horseback, and, leaping from his saddle, entreated me if I loved him, to try what I could do to tame his animal, which, he said, was so vicious that no horsemanship but mine would have any effect upon him. Without waiting for a reply, he seized the reins, leaped into the carriage, and drove off, begging me, when I had done with the horse, to let my servant take him to the stable: thither indeed he went, as soon as I had recovered from the effects of this astounding piece of assurance.

One evening, as we were leaving Julia's house, the colonel addressed me in a very quiet, and indeed in almost a friendly tone, "Faith now, my dear fellow," said he, "this won't do at all; as only one of us can marry this girl, we must not both of us go on loving her at this rate: so we'll meet to-morrow morning on Lansdown, and decide which it shall be. Just name your friend, and I'll desire my cousin Bob, who always attends me on these occasions, to call and arrange the affair." All the warmth of my affection for Julia thawed at these words: I could live for her, but I could not die for her; so I protested that had I known his pretensions to the lady, I should never have made advances, and should thenceforward think no more of her. This, he said, was so prodigiously handsome, that he should be happy to become more particularly acquainted with me; and we parted with an engagement that I should dine with him the next day, having, he said, six elegant sisters, whom he was desirous of introducing me to. I went, and was most graciously received by the whole family, particularly by Miss O'Shane, the eldest daughter, a short, thick girl, with flaxen hair, (now, like Lord Byron, "I hate a dumpy woman," and flaxen hair is my abomination,) white cheeks, and no eyebrows. Next this lady I was seated at dinner: in the evening we went to the rooms, and with this lady it was my fate to dance. The next morning the colonel called on me, and took me with him to inquire after the ladies: they were about to go on a shopping expedition, and Miss O'Shane was handed over to my protection. In short, by the extremely clever conduct of Mrs. O'Shane, Colonel O'Shane, and Miss O'Shane, the fashionable circles of the fashionable city of Bath, speedily resounded with the intended marriage of this accomplished young lady and Mr. Tyrrel Tremington. Things had gone on in this way for a few weeks when one morning meeting the colonel in the Crescent, he took me by the arm, and turning into the gravel walk,

"Faith, Tremington," said he, "really now I don't think you use me well in this affair with my sister; here's all the world acquainted with your attachment to Martha (I always detested the name of Martha) except her own brother, and your particular friend. Now if this concealment arose from any doubt of my consent, my dear fellow, put that out of your head, for I do not know the man with whom I would sooner trust the girl's happiness than yourself. Upon my soul, now, I'm in earnest; and she is, I must say, the best creature in the world—just suited to you—full of soul and sentiment, (a woman of soul and sentiment was always my abhorrence.) Just now, to be sure, a shade of melancholy hangs about her in consequence of Sir Thomas Liston's conduct—perhaps you have not heard of it—faith he was a great scoundrel. It was at Brighton last summer; he had been paying her attentions at all times and every where—as kind and affectionate as your own, my dear fellow—and every body said the day was fixed, as they do now respecting you, you know. He had made, too, considerable advances in her affections—not so far as you have, however, that I must acknowledge. Well, I spoke to him one morning, just as I am now speaking to you, and he had the impudence to tell me that he had nothing to do with the talk of the town, and that he had no intention of encumbering himself with a wife. You may guess the rest, my good fellow; we met the next morning on the Downs, and I settled his business completely. I never made a cleaner shot in my life—the surgeon told me afterwards that it went through the centre of the pericardium. It struck first just here," said the colonel, tapping the fourth button of the left lappel of my coat, and the blow, gentle as it was, would have prostrated me had it not been for the supporting arm of the colonel. But come, I see you are agitated," continued he, "and the sooner we get over the declaration—the premier pas, you know, the sooner your happiness will begin."

I stopped a moment—I thought that I also could tell him that I was not prepared to encumber myself with a wife; for a moment I considered whether it would not be better to be shot at once than to be married to Miss O'Shane; but the thought of the pistol-bullet through the centre of the pericardium came across my mind with all its dreadful circumstantiality, and I suffered myself to be led to the colonel's house, where we found the young lady solitary and melancholy. Here the colonel soon settled the business; he assured his sister of my unaltered attachment, entreated her by a sister's love to have compassion on the feelings of his friend, and when the girl hid her face in one hand, and held out the other, he placed the latter in mine with a most tremendous squeeze, and declared it to be the happiest day of his life. He then led me aside and entreated me not to hurry the wedding-day too quickly; he hoped I could wait three weeks; well, if I could not, if my ardour was so great, he must insist, for his sister's sake, that it should not take place for a fortnight. He then turned to his sister, and begged her, as she valued my happiness, she would not delay beyond the period he had named. What could Miss O'Shane reply to this affectionate adjuration? She turned up her eyes most pathetically, and vowed she valued my happiness too highly to permit her to refuse me any thing.

Thus I went home an engaged man, and announced my fate with tears and trembling to my mother. The good old lady scolded, for she could scold, and I had not outgrown the terrors of her voice; but arguments and anger were both thrown away upon me—the dreadful bullet through the pericardium rendered me deaf to the one, and careless of the other. My wedding morning arrived with a speed fearfully accelerated by my sensations of dread at its approach. Oh! that wretched morning! to complete its catalogue of miseries, it had been fixed on for the union of the colonel with my Julia. A large company was assembled at breakfast, but of the occurrences or conversation, either then or during the ceremony, I have no recollection; a sensation of utter despair overwhelmed me, and I have an indistinct remembrance of a vague desire to escape when the great door of the abbey-church was closed with a violence that sent its echoes along the vaulted aisles, and seemed to thunder in my ears the sentence of misery to which I was doomed.

English page

LITERARY NOTICES.

Clarence; or a Tale of our own Times. By the author of "Hope Leslie," &c. 2 vols. 12mo. Carey and Lea, 1830.

OPEN calling to mind the pleasant hours we passed in the society of the charming "Hope," we anticipated much gratification from being introduced to another of our fair author's Promethean creations; nor have we been disappointed. All the demands of expectation have fairly and fully been cancelled. The plot, though not particularly abstruse, is sufficiently involved, to keep curiosity on the alert throughout. The scene opens in Broadway—a lone and melancholy stranger is introduced to us in that "thronged thoroughfare," where meet the mingled representatives of every nation under heaven. The gloom of misanthropy is on his brow, and the bitter smile of contempt is curling on his lips, as, "unnoticed and unknown," he holds his solitary way amid the gairish and hollow-hearted throng. This picture is admirably wrought, and no one can fully realize the graphic power of the delineation, but he who has strolled there a kinless and uncared-for being, with a heart full of hidden sympathies, which like the waters of Horeb, needed but the grasp of a warm hand or the glance of a kind eye, to call them forth bright and gushing from his desolate bosom. The stranger proves to be the youngest son of an English gentleman, who after having been robbed of his wife by the villany of an elder brother, and of his only child, by the baseness of a miserly servant, retires to New-York, with an ample fortune acquired in the West Indies, to spend the evening of a wretched existence. Here he meets with his treacherous domestic, and the lost son of his first love, upon whose bosom he is at last permitted to die. His son after having been thrown by the base menial upon the charities of the almshouse, is adopted by a Mr. Roscoe, who gives him a liberal education, and the means to acquire a competent support. To him as rightful heir, the property of the deceased Clarence descended; but a suit was commenced by an English nephew, in the detail of which the author has given the outline of a trial which occurred here some months since, and eventuated in saving a worthy and high-minded fellow-citizen from a state prison, and a virtuous family from want and infamy. Just as Clarence comes into possession of his patrimony, he meets with a severe affliction in the loss of an only son, a noble and affectionate boy, over whose untimely fate the reader deeply sympathizes. With a heart bleeding from the severity of his misfortune, the father seeks a melancholy solace in the scenes of foreign lands. On his return, he finds his patron dead, and his brother's widow and son, young Roscoe, the hero of the tale, reduced to poverty. Gratefully anxious to discharge his obligation to the family in whose house his unprotected orphanage had found an asylum, he proffers his purse to the generous survivors, which is declined. Young Roscoe however consents to accept the agency of Mr. Clarence's concerns, with a salary competent to his own and his mother's wants, and at last, after sundry crosses and mischances, becomes his son-in-law, the husband of Gertrude Clarence, the heroine of the story. Much of the interest of the tale, however, depends on a minor plot, an affaire du cœur between Emilie Layton, a friend of Gertrude, Pedrillo, a would-be Spanish gentleman, and a young Virginian by the name of Marion. The latter is the successful rival, and the former, after many intrigues which are conducted with much skill and "fashion of truth" by the writer, loses his life in a desperate attempt to recover his betrothed from young Marion, who had anticipated him in her "abduction" from a masquerade. The fair couple are soon after united, and the tale concludes with a letter from Gertrude detailing the domestic arrangements and felicities of both parties, and containing a beautiful and merited compliment to the master spirit of the age, Sir Walter Scott.

In the main, we have been very agreeably interested during the perusal of these volumes, and to their fair author we cordially award the humble tribute of our commendation. Were we in a spirit to find fault, we might notice a few departures from grammatical precedent, and a few improbabilities in the action; but recollecting that this is the age of improvement, not only in phrenology but philology also, and that the writer, in a fictitious sketch of the present could not throw over it the softening hues with which the dim twilight of the past alone invests the semblances of truth, we pass on, unwilling to point out any false shade, any unavoidable asperity, or puny hair which may have fallen from the pencil, while so much of beauty and perfection remains. The characters are finely drawn, carefully defined and contrasted, and, for the most part, in good keeping. There are no embodied angels like the heroes and heroines of the old school of romance: no Cains or Conrads of later times—but human passions and human infirmities are made to pass in review before us. Our experience is not shocked by the exhibition of any marvellous qualities or unearthly prodigies of humanity; but in the record of our memories we find written many a name whose proprietor might have sat for the author's delineations.

Charles Clarence, though rarely seen after the first few chapters, is a well-drawn personage. His character may not be new to the reader, for such men are not unfrequent among us, but he will dwell upon it, as upon a good likeness of a valued friend. There is nothing striking in its conception, yet the sterling virtues displayed—contentedness in low estate, humility in prosperity, gratitude and benevolence—cannot be too often held up for our imitation. We cannot however, reconcile his want of equanimity in the breakfast parlour at Clarenceville, with his former gentleness; but as we were never subjected to the despotism of dyspepsia, we are no fair judges in this matter, and besides, we just now recollect our promise. Gertrude is a daughter who deserves such a parent. She possesses all the fine qualities of her father, with all the sweet charities and the fitting graces of woman, and is worthy to be the heroine of a tale illustrative of the unostentatious, yet not the less ennobling virtues of her fair countrywomen. Her pertinacity with regard to keeping her name a secret to her lover is a little eccentric, but the reader no doubt will pardon her. Emilie Layton differs very much from Gertrude. She exhibits none of the energy or the maturity of intellect which the latter displays, yet we are pleased with her affectionateness, her confiding innocence, and her childlike artlessness. Mrs. Layton is a little fashionable and affected piece of effeminacy, better fitted for Parisian coquetties than the sober duties of a mother, which by the way, Mrs. Roscoe so admirably graces. Gerald Roscoe, the hero of the work, is a noble character. His feelings and sentiments are those of a high-souled and ingenuous man. We like to contrast his magnanimity with the baseness and sensuality of Pedrillo, his fearlessness with the pusillanimity of Layton, and his manliness with the almost feminine sensibility of the unfortunate Seton.

The style in which this work is written, is chaste and beautiful. The vivacity and clearness that we have so often admired in the author's former productions, are not wanting in this. The language, like a perfect transparency, shows every idea in its fairest light. It abounds with pleasing images drawn from the lore of the past and the visible presentations of nature, appropriately introduced, and as clearly reflected as stars from the polished surface of a sleeping lake. A rich vein of delicate and sparkling wit pervades the gayer scenes of the work; and nothing can surpass in keenness the satire which is pointed at the travelling Englishman, whose name the reader will easily recognise. A salutary moral influence also obtains throughout these volumes. No one can read them without feeling the grasp of his darker passions loosened—his virtuous resolutions strengthened, and his whole heart improved. He may not coincide with all the author's views of religion, but he will be assured of her sincerity and the benevolence of her intentions; and even then he will rise from the perusal better than when he sat down. Unlike the false principles and loose ethics of some late novels, we should have no fears in placing it in the hands of youth, for there is not a thought in it that would sully the brightness of innocence herself. We are glad that while scepticism is multiplying her efforts at proselytism, the friends of virtue have so able a coadjutor as Miss Sedgwick.

The Valley of the Nashaway, and other Poems. By Rufus Dawes. Boston, 1830. Carter & Hendee. 1 vol. pp. 96.

The author of these poems has long been known as a writer of great sweetness. He is gifted with a nice perception of the beauties of nature, and a mind that loves to hold its converse with the gentlest and most minute philosophies. The reputation of Mr. Dawes as a poet, is not the less valuable for being an unobtrusive one. We recollect reading and admiring "Sunrise from Mount Washington" and other productions of his pen, long before his name had become familiar to us. There is a peculiarity in the writings of this gentleman which will often subject him to the shafts of illiberal criticism, and most probably will prove a bar to his attaining a very exalted reputation. We allude to a fondness for dignifying with the visits of his muse, persons and subjects so humble and unattractive in situation and circumstances, as to be wholly unworthy of such distinction. To the poet of imagination, who is endowed with a very exquisite relish for the beautiful, wherever it may be found, all things are presented through a medium too refined for visions of less delicate perception. Our meaning may be aptly illustrated by referring to the poems of "Margaret" and "Mary Hall," in the present collection; in the first of which, much good poetry is lavished upon one who "Was a serving maid, whose duties were

To watch the children placed in trust with her,
And wait at table for her lady's call,
Within the breakfast room, or dining hall," and who died of love for the son of her mistress. This romance of humble life is but another evidence that

"The course of true love never did run smooth."

The closing lines of this poem are touchingly beautiful:

"But time drank up her tears, and sorrow now,
Wept out her life blood—and her pallid brow
Grew deadly, and the hectic on her cheek
Mocked the dull roses, and her voice grew weak.
Her lips were red—but with the purple tide
That bubbled from her heart—and so she died."

In the other effusion to which we have alluded, the author is in raptures at the sound of a female voice, warbling its wood-notes wild; the occupation of the charming vocalist is thus described:

"And close beside her, o'er a blaze,
A water vessel boiling,
Told plainly how she passed her days
In solitary toiling."

These will be held as faults by the generality of readers and critics; and though occasionally a kindred mind may appreciate the fine moralities they contain, yet a severe and correct taste would lead the "streams from Castaly" through less objectional channels.

Though we do not admit that "a critic's merit is to find a fault," yet a wholesome correction of a writer's obvious deficiencies are valuable as giving the more weight to the commendations he may bestow. We turn now with pleasure to notice a few of the beauties comprised in the volume before us. The principal poem is descriptive of the author's native valley. It is in the heroic measure—the versification smooth and melodious, and some of the thoughts sweetly poetical. We quote the opening lines, which possess much grace and beauty.

"The queen of May has bound her virgin brow;
And hung with blossoms every fruit-tree bough;
The sweet southwest, among the early flowers,
Whispers the coming of delighted hours,
While birds, within the heaping foliage, sing
Their music—welcome to returning spring."

Oh, nature! loveliest in thy green attire,
Dear mother of the passion-kindling lyre;
Thou, who in early days, upled'st me where
The mountains freeze above the summer air;
Or lured'st my wandering way beside the streams,
To watch the bubbles as they mocked my dreams,
Lead me again, thy flowery paths among,
To sing of native scenes, as yet unused!"

The closing lines are likewise very pretty.

"Once more I turn to thee, fair Nashaway!
The farewell tribute of my humble lay;
The time may come, when lofty notes shall bear
Thy peerless beauty to the gladdened air;
Now, to the lyre no daring hand aspires,
And rust grows cankering on its unspooled wires,
Our lays are like the fitful strains that flow
From careless birds, that carol as they go;
Content beneath the mountain top to sing,
And only touch Castalia with a wing."

There is a beautiful thought in the concluding lines of the following stanza:

"Yes, still I love thee—time who sets
His signet on my brow,
And dims my sunken eye, forgets
The heart he could not bow;
Where love, that cannot perish grows
For one, alas! that little knows
How love may sometimes last;
Like sunshine wasting in the skies,
When clouds are overcast."

We have already occupied with our notice of this work as much space as our columns will allow, and with a kindly greeting to the author, take our leave of him by quoting the following lines, bearing the impress both of feeling and poetry; we have met with them before without knowing their parentage.

ANNE BULLEN.

"I weep while gazing on thy modest face,
Thou pictured history of woman's love!
Joy spreads his burning pinions on thy cheek,
Shaming its whiteness; and thine eyes are full
Of conscious beauty, as they undulate.
Yet all thy loveliness, deluded girl,
Served but to light thy ruin. Is there not,
Kind heaven, some secret talisman of hearts
Whereby to find a resting-place for love?
Unhappy maid! let thy sad story teach
The beautiful and young, that while their path
Softens with roses—danger may be there;
That love may watch the bubbles of the stream,
But never trust his image on the wave."

We ought to remark that the work is very neatly got up. The Bostonians do these things well. They are peerless in paper, and have a taste in typography. We commend the volume to our readers; it may be procured of the Messrs. Carvill, in Broadway.

Paul Clifford: by the author of Pelham, Derwent, &c.
2 vols. 12mo. J. & J. Harper, New-York.

The author of Pelham has put forth another effort, and, if we may judge from the praises bestowed on it, a more successful and brilliant one than all the preceding. It carries us back to the age of Swift and Bolingbroke, and "for wit, argument, pictures of real life and imagination, is inferior to no novel of the present day." So asserts the London Literary Gazette. Our own opinions touching its individual claims, shall be stated as soon as we have had leisure to peruse it. Probably before that period every reader in New-York will have formed his own estimate, so eager and intense is the curiosity to grasp at whatever issues from the pen of Bulwer.

The following description of the heroine, Lucy Brandon, may not be uninteresting to the reader.

"Never did glass give back a more lovely image than that of Lucy Brandon at the age of nineteen. Her auburn hair fell in the richest luxuriance over a brow never ruffled, and a cheek where the blood never slept; with every instant the colour varied, and at every variation that smooth, pure, virgin cheek seemed still more lovely than before. She had the most beautiful laugh that one who loved music could imagine,—silvery, low, and yet so full of joy! all her movements, as the old parson said, seemed to keep time to that laugh; for mirth made a great part of her innocent and childish temper; and yet the mirth was feminine, never loud, nor like that of young ladies who have received the last finish at Highgate seminaries. Every thing joyous affected her, and at once,—air,—flowers,—sunshine,—butterflies. Unlike heroines in general, she very seldom cried, and she saw nothing charming in having the vapours. But she never looked so beautiful as in sleep! and as the light breath came from her parted lips, and the ivory lids closed over those eyes which only in sleep were silent,—and her attitude in her sleep took that ineffable grace belonging solely to childhood, or the fresh youth into which childhood merges,—she was just what you might imagine a sleeping Margaret, before that most simple and gentle of all poet's visions of womanhood had met with Faust, and ruffled her slumbers with a dream of love. We cannot say much for Lucy's intellectual acquirements; she could, thanks to the parson's wife, spell indifferently well, and write a tolerable hand; she made preserves, and sometimes riddles—it was more difficult to question the excellence of the former than to answer the queries of the latter. She worked to the admiration of all that knew her, and we beg leave to say that we deem that 'an excellent thing in woman.' She made caps for herself and gowns for the poor, and now and then she accomplished the more literary labour of a stray novel that had wandered down to the manor house, or an abridgment of ancient history, in which was omitted every thing but the proper names. To these attainments she added a certain modicum of skill upon the spinet, and the power of singing old songs with the richest and sweetest voice that ever made one's eyes moisten, or one's heart beat. Her moral qualities were more fully developed than her mental. She was the kindest of human beings; the very dog that had never seen her before, knew that truth at the first glance, and lost no time in making her acquaintance. The goodness of her heart reposed upon her face like sunshine, and the old wife at the lodge said poetically and truly of the effect it produced, that 'one felt warm when one looked on her.' If we could abstract from the description a certain chilling transparency, the following exquisite verses of a forgotten poet might express the purity and lustre of her countenance—

'Her face was like the milky way i' the sky,
A meeting of gentle lights without a name.'

She was surrounded by pets of all kinds, ugly and handsome, from Ralph the raven, to Beauty the pheasant, and from Bob the sheep dog without a tail, to Beau the Blenheim with blue ribands round his neck; all things loved her, and she loved all things. It seemed doubtful at that time whether she would ever have sufficient steadiness and strength of character. Her beauty and her character appeared alike so essentially sexual, soft, yet lively, buoyant, yet caressing, that you could scarcely place in her that moral dependence, that you might in a character less amiable, but less yieldingly feminine. Time, however, and circumstance, which alters and hardens, were to decide whether the inward nature did not possess some latent, and yet undiscovered properties."

Mr. Bulwer has been reproached with making his heroines too poetical, too much "bright creatures of the element;" but nothing can be more exquisite, yet more true, more feminine, both in her romance and her reality, than the present heroine.

Stories of a Bride: by the authoress of the Mummy. 2 vols. New-York. J. & J. Harper.

The title-page of this new novel tells that we are indebted for it to the authoress (why not author? we should not say the makeress of a watch, or the paintress of a picture) of the Mummy. We have never seen the Mummy, and have not an idea whether it be novel, play, or poem, but there is exactly the quality that it is a very clever book, (if it is a book) for the one before us is fully entitled to that cognomen. We do not just remember any thing in English satire, since Swift, or in French after Voltaire, that is better done than the lively, sarcastic touches with which the character and history of the Bride, are hit off in the introduction to these Stories; and in the conduct of the tales themselves, there is much local and general knowledge, considerable tact, and sufficient interest. The first fifty or sixty pages of the first volume are undoubtedly the best of the whole, and indeed the matter contained in them is so different in style and manner from the remainder of the work, that we could without any very terrifying exertion of credulity, believe that it had proceeded from another pen; but the whole is very fair, and like most of the novels lately republished by the Harpers, not unworthy the transplantation to the American soil which they have given it. It is consoling to reflect, that since we must have novels, so many of them are at least tolerably well worth having.

Ralph Marvyn, or the Maniac's Prophecy: by the author of "Leisure Hours at Sea."

A novel will shortly be published under this name, from the pen of that well known and popular writer, William Leggett, Esq. author of Leisure Hours at Sea, and late editor of the Critic. Public expectation is quite alive on the subject, and we feel bold to say is not fated to meet with disappointment. It is an honourable evidence of the industry and active talents of Mr. Leggett, that although engaged in the toilsome labours of co-editor of one of our most respectable evening papers, it is said that he is preparing for the press several publications, of which the novel just cited, and a tragedy for Mr. Forrest, are not the least conspicuous.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

We are happy to learn, from late English papers, that Miss Mitford is about to produce a new volume of Country Stories. A new edition of the Gold Headed Cane is announced as in the London press. This amusing collection of anecdotes of the medical profession is written by Dr. M'Michael.

Preparing for publication, a second series of Stories from the History of Scotland. By the Rev. Alexander Stewart, which is intended to complete the work.

A second edition, enlarged and improved, of Historical Sketches of the Native Irish and their descendants; illustrative of their past and present state, with regard to literature, education, and oral instruction; by Christopher Anderson, is promised.

Montgomery is said to be engaged by Dr. Lardner, the conductor of the Cabinet Cyclopaedia, to write the Lives of the Poets. We shall, doubtless, have some delightful reading from his well-practised pen.

The National Portrait Gallery, containing thirty-six highly finished portraits of illustrious and eminent individuals of the nineteenth century, has been published. Edited by W. Jerdan, Esq. F. S. A., &c.

Murray's Family Library, Vol. XL; containing the first volume of an abridgement of Washington Irving's Life of Columbus, is in the English press.

Moore is preparing a Life of Petrarch.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

PLEASING EXPERIMENT.—The following is from the Pittsburgh Gazette:—A few days ago we had occasion to visit the blacksmith's shop of one of our ingenious mechanics. While we were there the proprietor came in and showed us a small piece of silver which had once been a quarter of a dollar, but which no longer presented the slightest vestige of an impression. He told us he wished to ascertain whether it was a quarter of a dollar or a seventeen cent piece. He then laid the piece upon a bar of iron, heated to a red heat, where it was suffered to remain for a few seconds, perhaps half a minute. Upon examining it, after it had cooled, the impression was almost as plain and distinct as when it was coined—the date 1776. Being then satisfied that the heat produced such an effect upon coins from which the impression had been abraded, the question at once occurred to us, how is this effect produced? After considerable reflection upon this subject, we came to the following conclusion:—In coining money that part of the planchet or piece which is sunk, becomes more compressed than those which stand in relief. In the course of time the relieves or prominent parts are worn off, and the piece becomes perfectly smooth and level on its surface. When a great heat is applied, the sunken or compressed part of the piece swells out to its original thickness, and thus presents the impression very distinctly to the eye—those parts of the coin which were before sunk being now presented in relief, and those parts which were in relief being now sunk.

VALUABLE COLLECTION OF CURIOSITIES.—The French journals speak of the results of the honourable enterprises of M. Champollion the younger, who has just returned from Egypt after twenty months absence, as highly numerous and important. This traveller has brought with him a collection of one thousand five hundred designs, the greater part coloured, relating to a multitude of subjects, historical, religious, and civil. The notices they give of the domestic life, arts, and manners of the Egyptians, are said to be almost complete. Among them are views executed on a large scale, giving a just idea of the magnificence and vastness of Egyptian architecture. M. Champollion has collected a multitude of authentic facts illustrating the history of the most ancient periods. In the meantime he has not neglected the interests of the museum entrusted to his charge. Many choice articles have been added to the royal collection. Several chests of antiquities have already arrived in Paris, and the Astrolabe is to convey from Toulon to Havre the monuments of great bulk, such as the sarcophagi, the bas reliefs, and the Egyptian and Greek mummies. Among the articles brought home by M. Champollion is a bronze statue inlaid with golden ornaments. A series of zoological subjects is also mentioned, copied by the traveller from one of the most ancient tombs of Egypt.

LANDSCAPE ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE WAVERLEY NOVELS.—The first number of these illustrations, says a late London journal, has just been published by Mr. Charles Tilt, of Fleet-street, and if they are pronounced some what high in price, it must be added that they are of corresponding merit and beauty. Indeed, we have never seen any thing more excellent of their class; and they will form a new and most delightful feature of the works to which they address themselves. This first number consists of four engravings, executed by W. and E. Finden, in a state of delicacy, purity, and beauty, that, in one or two instances, cannot be surpassed. The first plate, for instance, a view of Arran (referring to the "Heart of Mid Lothian") is perfect, no less in brilliant spirit than its delicate sweetness. The fourth (Windermere) is equally beautiful; and the two others, though not so perfect in some of their details, particularly in the skies, are full of merit, and cannot fail to excite a lively interest and admiration.

A TOMB ADORNED WITH PAINTINGS.—A correspondent at Rome writes as follows, under date of the thirty-first of March: "At Campo Saba, a tomb, adorned with paintings in the interior, has lately been dug up. On the fourth wall, was found the tomb of Athleta. Near him were an iron quito, and his arms in bronze; the three prizes which he had gained were at his feet; also a beautiful tripod, some prefericoli and a cup. All these objects are in bronze, and in good preservation. Near the tripod was a vase on which Minerva is personified by a siren playing on a double flute. On the other side Hercules and Iole are represented. A gold ring was likewise found, on which is engraved a lion, the symbol of the Athleta's courage.

CURIOUS GLASS TUBE.—A French paper states that a very beautiful instrument, consisting of a glass tube, twisted into a variety of windings, was invented about six months since, by M. Prosper Lagarde, for the purpose of illustrating the principle of the circulation of the blood, which is still contested by some of the faculty. At the summit of the tube is a reservoir, filled with spirits of wine, which is put in motion by the atmospheric air, and circulates throughout the whole extent, drop by drop, till it returns again to the reservoir. Crowds of people stop to admire this ingenious instrument before the shop where it is exposed.

IRON.—An important discovery has recently been made in the manufacture of iron, which accelerates the process of converting the cast into bar iron, and at the same time has a material influence upon the quality, by decomposing the carbon and injurious substances combined with the iron, and which, in the ordinary method of manufacturing, cannot be destroyed. It likewise has the effect of separating and completely vitrifying the aluminous and siliceous earths, which destroy the tenacity and malleability of the iron. It is now ascertained that by means of this simple and economical application many ores and materials may be used for the production of iron, which could not formerly be worked. The process, for which a patent has been obtained, is now in operation.

ALABAMA SILK.—We have received, says the Mobile Register, from a gentleman residing in our immediate vicinity, four samples of silk, made at his plantation. Their colours are, as they were reeled from the cocoons, a pearly white, a pure straw colour, and a rich bright saffron. We do not profess to be judges of the article in its present state, but by persons who are acquainted with the subject, the silk is said to be remarkable for strength and fineness of fibre, and is very handsomely reeled.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

THE RAMBLER.—NUMBER TWENTY-TWO.

BOY-MEN AND GIRL-WOMEN.

THESE are two species of the human family which have not as yet been distinctly classed or named by naturalists, and are therefore obliged to be designated by compounds. The individuals which compose these species, are such as are hovering between the last stages of boy and girlhood, and the first dawnings of a more mature state of existence—full-grown children, or incipient men and women. They are the unfinished portions of humanity which poets and sentimentalists have, from time immemorial, sung and said so much about, though for what especial reason is more than many worldly people are able to discover. Poets are fine fellows, but a love of truth, or a desire to represent things as they really are, is not to be found in the list of their good qualities. They warp and twist their materials, to suit their own purposes, more than a theological disputant or a petty sessions lawyer, and build a towering structure on a slighter foundation than a purblind antiquary. They are much given to the use of hypothesis, and after they have once supposed that a thing can be so and so, they immediately set it down that it is so. Exaggeration is another of their little foibles:—with them a glimpse of goodness signifies perfection, and a glimmering of sin the essence of iniquity; and so it is in consequence of this, that they come to make such delightful and diabolical pictures out of nothing at all. Some of the cleverest of them have, at one period or other of their lives, met with two or three charming young girls, just "bursting into womanhood," or a few intelligent boys, and being great generalizers, they have taken it for granted that all were so; and thus it has come to pass in English poetry, that this is celebrated as the most delectable stage of existence. It is a state that may or may not be pleasant enough to those who are passing through it, but it is by no means productive of much pleasure and gratification to those with whom they come in contact; and whatever prose or poetry may say to the contrary, I think worldly experience will bear me out in upholding that boy-men and girl-women, are neither more nor less than bores of very considerable magnitude.

The girl-woman is generally a rather pretty creature, dressed in something between a frock and a gown, made of white muslin, with a pink sash round her waist. Her face has lost the free and unembarrassed expression of childhood, without having attained the self-possession and dignity of woman. The graces of her person are as yet but half developed; her shoulders are sharp and angular, and her arms look long and unpleasantly slender. She is too mature to wear her hair in a crop, and too childish to have it piled in towers of curls and combs on the top of her head. Indeed, let her dress be what it will, it appears alike unfit for the stage through which she has just passed, or the one on which she is about to enter. Her intellectual faculties and conversation are in an equally uncertain state, and the person who addresses her is sorely puzzled how to hit the right medium between juvenility and maturity. She has not made up her mind whether she likes Byron or skipping-rope best, but decidedly prefers Mrs. Opie to the author of Waverley. If you talk of school you offend her, and yet she knows not how to discourse about any thing else—so that all the conversation consists of an abrupt observation and an embarrassed rejoinder; and if she can be prevailed upon to venture more than six syllables at a time, she has a bad habit of speaking unpleasant truths, and afterwards looking distressingly conscious, not exactly knowing whether she has done right or wrong. She sits on her chair, holding in one hand a white pocket-handkerchief, and not a little perplexed what to do with the other; with an eternal simper hanging around her mouth, ready to be aggravated into a laugh upon the most trivial occasion. If any body tells a joke with a grave face, she looks grave too, but is mightily tickled with the hymeneal allusions and matrimonial witticisms of which the more mature part of the company are delivered. She does not understand or appreciate worldly knowledge, yet she has school learning enough to find you out if you talk foolishly. In short, she is altogether in a very unsettled state, filled with childish reminiscences and womanly aspirations, and is, when a man feels grave or low-spirited, one of the most unendurable annoyances with which he can well be afflicted.

But if your girl-woman is an undesirable individual, your boy-man is one of the greatest nuisances upon the face of the earth. There is something charming about the female sex at almost every period of their existence; and even in town a very young lady, though certainly a subject for apprehension, has some redeeming points; while in the country, after a scamper in the fields, or a chase after a bird or butterfly, with her eyes filled with fire and animation, her cheeks glowing with health and exercise, her clustering curls dancing in the wind, and her pretty bonnet hanging loosely and carelessly on the back part of her head, she is a truly beautiful and poetical object. But your boy-man is a monster wherever you meet with him. In the country he is an "unlicked cub," a lout, a bumpkin; in town, a half made up coxcomb, an unfinished puppy, a thing with nearly all the vices and follies of a man, without his sense or passions. It is his oath that rings loudest in the tavern, and his tongue that is most clamorous in its demands for strong drink to destroy his puny constitution, merely because he thinks it looks manly. He is altogether a foolish and contemptible creature, for even his vicious habits do not afford him pleasure. He does not, like the real voluptuary, "roll sin like a sweet morsel under his tongue," but counterfeits bad habits, and will drink and smoke, though both be unpleasant to him and make him sick, merely because older people do so; and this it is which prevents him ever becoming what it is the height of his ambition to appear—a man; and this it is, that makes so many portions of the human family bear such a striking resemblance to "forked radishes" and thread-papers. Then the swearing of these grown children is perfectly disgusting. From a man, borne away by passion, or from an old sailor, to whom it has become a trick of custom, and who, moreover, seems to be a sort of person privileged to wish his eyes no good, a few anathemas do not come with so bad a grace; but to hear these would-be men repeating, like parrots, all the vulgar oaths that low blackguardism has invented and perpetuated, merely because they have arrived at the dignity of shaving, is very nauseous. These too are the small fry that swarm about billiard-rooms and theatre lobbies; that open box doors and stand in the doorways adjusting their ringlets, much to the discomfort of shivering ladies and rheumatic old gentlemen, imagining all the time that the eyes of the whole audience are turned to the particular spot which they occupy. They are, indeed, take them altogether, simply the most empty, impudent, noisy, impertinent, obtrusive set of varlets that can be imagined, and are not ashamed of any thing—except having no whiskeys.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

PORTRAITS OF CELEBRATED CHARACTERS.

GIOVANNI BELZONI.

OF the enterprising subject of the present memoir, little is recorded worthy of notice in the early portion of his life. Belzoni was the architect of his own fame. The zeal and activity he manifested in the prosecution of his laborious discoveries made in Egypt and Nubia, and the success which rewarded those exertions, are the only causes which can interest the general reader.

He was born at Padua, and descended from a Roman family which resided there many years. In 1803 he visited England and married shortly after. From this period to 1812 he is described as experiencing various vicissitudes of fortune, and at one time became so reduced as to exhibit himself at Astley's amphitheatre as a performer of "Herculean feats of strength," a task he was well qualified for, from his surprising physical powers and athletic frame.

In 1812 he left England for the continent, and in 1815 we find him embarking for Egypt, "for the purpose of constructing hydraulic machines to water the fields with greater expedition and less expense than the method usually adopted in that country." This design was the result of some successful experiments in hydraulics which his enterprising talents had discovered. While in Egypt curiosity led him to visit the pyramids in the neighbourhood of Cairo; his description of these stupendous works of human ingenuity and labour is highly interesting, which our limits preclude us from noticing farther than merely mentioning the circumstance as being connected with the important discoveries he subsequently made among the tombs of ancient Thebes.

He afterwards determined to leave Cairo, and accordingly applied to Mr. Salt, the British consul, to procure him a firman from the bashaw to sail up the Nile. Mr. Salt availed himself of this opportunity to propose to Belzoni the removal of the head of the statue of the younger Memnon, which lay at Gornou, a village near Thebes, for the purpose of conveying it down the Nile to Alexandria, where it might be shipped to London, as a present to the British museum—a proposal that was agreed to by Belzoni, and faithfully executed by him after incredible difficulty and labour.

After depositing the colossal bust in the Bashaw's magazine at Alexandria, agreeably to stipulation with his employer, he visited every place worthy the attention of the traveller and antiquary. He then returned to the scene of his former researches, and in the sacred valley of Beban el Malook, he made his grand discovery of the tomb of Psammathia, king of Egypt. He caused the earth to be dug up at the foot of a steep hill, immediately under a torrent, where no vestige of a tomb appeared. He kept the men employed at work, however, for three days, and at length discovered an entrance into the solid rock, eighteen feet below the surface. On entering, Belzoni found himself in a beautiful hall twenty-seven feet long, and about the same in breadth; this hall led to several corridors and chambers, adorned with paintings and statues representing the Egyptian gods and goddesses, in a high state of preservation, and in the last of these chambers he discovered one of the most perfect and valuable remains of Egyptian antiquity—a sarcophagus of the finest oriental alabaster, which he afterwards sold to the British government, by whom it was presented to the British museum, where it is now deposited.

Mr. Belzoni was employed for twelve months in making drawings of all the figures, hieroglyphics, emblems, ornaments, &c. in the tomb, and he also took impressions in wax of every thing worthy of notice, in all which he was assisted by an able artist, M. Ricci.

Shortly after completing his labours he resolved to leave Egypt altogether. On his arrival at Alexandria he determined, previous to sailing, to visit the Oasis of Ammon. He set off accordingly, and visited most of the celebrated spots of antiquity which lay in his route. Among other places of note he examined the tombs and fountain mentioned by Herodotus in Melpomene, and which he places near the temple of Jupiter Ammon. On his return to Alexandria he sailed for his native country, where he was presented by his admiring countrymen with a medal which was struck in honour of his splendid discoveries.

From Padua he sailed for England, where he made an exhibition of the various treasures brought by him from Egypt, which, together with a fac-simile of the tomb of king Psammathia, engaged the attention of the British public for two seasons.

In 1823 Belzoni left England for the purpose of prosecuting his travels in the interior of Africa. Accordingly he embarked in his majesty's brig Swinger, to be conveyed to Benin, which place he reached the latter end of November, intending to proceed from thence to Houssa and Tombuctoo. He, however, was destined to add another to the many victims who have perished in the ardour of attempting to gain those interesting points of African research. On the twenty-sixth of November he was seized with a violent disease which terminated in his death on the third of December. His remains were interred the next day at Gato, and were followed to the grave by the British residents at that settlement, who, together with the officers and crew of a British brig, had before shown every possible respect and attention to the celebrated traveller.

H.*

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE BLACK-MOSS.

IN TWO PARTS.—PART THE LAST.

HANNAH LEE had lived from home for more than six months, and it was not to be thought that she was not beloved in the farmer's family. Soon after she had left the house, the farmer's son, a youth of about eighteen years, who had been among the hills, looking after the sheep, came home, and was disappointed to find that he had lost an opportunity of accompanying Hannah part of the way to her father's cottage. But the hour of eight had gone by, and not even the company of young William Grieve could induce the kind-hearted daughter to delay setting out on her journey a few minutes beyond the time promised to her parents.

"I do not like the night," said William, "there will be a fresh fall of snow soon, or the witch of Glen Scrae is a liar, for a snow cloud is hanging o'er the Birch-tree-linn, and it may be down to the Black-moss as soon as Hannah Lee."

So he called his two sheep-dogs that had taken their place under the long table before the window, and set out, half in joy, half in fear, to overtake Hannah, and see her safely across the Black-moss.

The snow began to drift so fast, that before he had reached the head of the glen, there was nothing to be seen but a little bit of the wooden rail of the bridge across the Sauch-burn. William Grieve was the most active shepherd in a large pastoral parish—he had often past the night among the wintry hills for the sake of a few sheep, and all the snow that ever fall from heaven would not have made him turn back when Hannah Lee was before him; and as his terrified heart told him, in imminent danger of being lost. As he advanced he felt that it was no longer a walk of love or friendship, for which he had been glad of an excuse. Death stared him in the face, and his young soul, now beginning to feel all the passions of youth, was filled with phrensy. He had seen Hannah every day—at the fireside—at work—in the kitchen—on holidays—at prayers—bringing supper to his aged parents; smiling and singing about the house from morning till night. She had often brought his own meal to him among the hills—and he now found, that though he had never talked to her about love, except smilingly and playfully, that he loved her beyond father or mother or his own soul.

"I will save thee, Hannah," he cried with a loud sob, "or lie down beside thee in the snow—and we will die together in our youth."

A wild whistling wind went by him, and the snow-flakes whirled so fiercely round his head, that he staggered on for a while in utter blindness. He knew the path that Hannah must have taken, and went forwards shouting aloud, and stopping every twenty yards to listen for a voice. He sent his well-trained dogs over the snow in all directions—repeating to them her name, "Hannah Lee," that the dumb animals might, in their sagacity, know for whom they were searching; and as they looked up in his face, and set off to scour the moor, he almost believed that they knew his meaning, (and it is probable they did,) and were eager to find in her bewilderment the kind maiden by whose hand they had so often been fed. Often went they off into the darkness, and as often returned, but their looks showed that every quest had been in vain. Meanwhile the snow was of a fearful depth, and falling without intermission or diminution. Had the young shepherd been thus alone, walking across the moor on his ordinary business, it is probable that he might have been alarmed for his own safety—nay that, in spite of all his strength and agility, he might have sunk down beneath the inclemency of the night and perished. But now the passion of his soul carried him with supernatural strength along, and extricated him from wretch and pitfall. Still there was no trace of poor Hannah Lee—and one of his dogs at last came close to his feet, worn out entirely, and afraid to leave its master—while the other was mute, and, as the shepherd thought, probably unable to force its way out of some hollow, or through some floundering drift. Then he all at once knew that Hannah Lee was dead—and dashed himself down in the snow in a fit of passion. It was the first time that the youth had ever been sorely tried—all his hidden and unconscious love for the fair lost girl had flowed up from the bottom of his heart—and at once the sole object which had blessed his life and made him the happiest of the happy, was taken away and cruelly destroyed—so that sullen, wrathful, baffled, and despairing, there he lay cursing his existence, and in too great agony to think of prayer. "God," he then thought, "has forsaken me—and why should he think on me, when he suffers one so good and beautiful as Hannah Lee to be frozen to death." God thought both of him and Hannah—and through his infinite mercy forgave the sinner in his wild turbulence of passion. William Grieve had never gone to bed without joining in prayer; and he revered the Sabbath-day and kept it holy. Much is forgiven to the human heart by him who so fearfully framed it; and God is not slow to pardon the love which one human being bears to another, in his frailty—even though that love forget or arraign his own unsleeping providence. His voice has told us to love one another; and William loved Hannah in simplicity, innocence, and truth. That she should perish was a thought so dreadful, that, in its agony, God seemed a ruthless being—"Blow—blow—blow—and drift us up for ever—we cannot be far asunder—O Hannah—Hannah—think ye not that heaven has forsaken us?"

As the boy groaned these words passionately through his quivering lips, there was a sudden lowness in the air, and he heard the barking of his absent dog, while the one at his feet hurried off in the direction of the sound, and soon loudly joined the cry. It was not a bark of surprise, or anger, or fear—but of recognition and love. William sprung up from his bed in the snow, and with his heart knocking at his bosom even to sickness, he rushed headlong through the drifts, with a giant's strength, and fell down half dead with joy and terror beside the body of Hannah Lee!

But he soon recovered from that fit, and lifting the cold corpse in his arms, he kissed her lips, and her cheeks, and her forehead, and her closed eyes, till, as he kept gazing on her face in utter despair, her head fell back on his shoulder, and a long deep sigh came from her inmost bosom.

"She is yet alive, thank God!" and as that expression left his lips for the first time that night, he felt a pang of remorse; "I said, O God, thou that hast forsaken us—I am not worthy to be saved; but let not this maiden perish, for the sake of her parents, who have no other child." The distracted youth prayed to God with the same earnestness as if he had been beseeching a fellow-creature, in whose hand was the power of life and death. The presence of the Great Being was felt by him in the dark and howling wild, and strength was imparted to him as to a deliverer. He bore along the fair child in his arms, even as if she had been a lamb. The snow-drift blew not—the wind fell dead—a sort of glimmer, like that of an upbreathing and departing storm, gathered about him—his dogs barked, and jumped, and burrowed joyfully in the snow—and the youth, strong in sudden hope, exclaimed, "With the blessing of heaven, which has not deserted us in our sore distress, will I carry thee, Hannah, in my arms, and lay thee down alive in the house of thy father." At this moment there were no stars in the sky, but she opened her dim blue eyes upon him in whose bosom she was unconsciously lying, and said, as in a dream,

"Send the riband that ties up my hair, as a keepsake, to William Grieve."

"She thinks that she is on her death-bed, and forgets me not. It is the voice of heaven that tells me she will not now die, and that, under its grace, I shall be her deliverer."

The short-lived rage of the storm was soon over, and William could attend to the beloved being on his bosom. The warmth of his heart seemed to infuse life into hers; and as he gently placed her feet on the snow, till he muffled her up in his plaid, as well as in her own, she made an effort to stand, and with extreme perplexity and bewilderment faintly inquired where she was, and what fearful catastrophe had befallen them? She was, however, too weak to walk; and as her young friend carried her along, she murmured,

"O William, what if my father be in the moor? For if you who need care so little about me, have come hither, as I suppose, to save my life, you may be sure that my father sat not within doors during the storm."

As she spoke it was calm below, but the wind was still alive in the upper air, and cloud, rack, mist, and sleet, were all driving about in the sky. Out shone for a moment the pallid and ghostly moon, through a rent in the gloom, and by that uncertain light, came staggering forward the figure of a man.

"Father—father!" cried Hannah—and his gray hairs were already on her cheek. The barking of the dogs and the shouting of the young shepherd had struck his ear, as the sleep of death was stealing over him, and with the last effort of benumbed nature, he had roused himself from that fatal torpor, and prest through the snow-wreath that had separated him from his child. As yet they knew not of the danger each had endured, but each judged of the other's sufferings from their own, and father and daughter regarded one another as creatures rescued, and hardly yet rescued, from death.

But a few minutes ago, and the three human beings who loved each other so well, and now feared not to cross the Moor in safety, were, as they thought, on their death-beds. Deliverance now shone upon them all like a gentle fire, dispelling that pleasant but deadly drowsiness; and the old man was soon able to assist William Grieve in leading Hannah along through the snow. Her colour and her warmth returned, and her lover—for so might he well now be called—felt her heart gently beating against his side. Filled as that heart was with gratitude to heaven, joy in her deliverance, love to her father, and purest affection for William, never before had the innocent maiden known what was happiness—and never more was she to forget it. The night was now almost calm, and fast returning to its former beauty, when the party saw the first twinkle of the fire through the low window of the cottage of the Moor. They soon were at the garden gate—and to relieve the heart of the wife and mother within, they talked loudly and cheerfully, naming each other familiarly, and laughing between, like persons who had known neither danger nor distress.

No voice answered from within, no footstep came to the door, which stood open as when the father had left it in his fear, and now he thought with affright that his wife, feeble as she was, had been unable to support the loneliness, and had followed him out into the night, never to be brought home alive. As they bore Hannah into the house, this fear gave way to worse, for there upon the hard clay floor lay the mother upon her face, as if murdered by some savage blow. She was in the same deadly swoon into which she had fallen on her husband's departure three hours before. The old man raised her up, and her pulse was still—so was her heart—her face pale and sunken—and her body cold as ice.

"I have recovered a daughter," said the old man, "but I have lost a wife;" and he carried her, with a groan, to the bed on which he laid her lifeless body. The sight was too much for Hannah, worn out as she was, and who had hitherto been able to support herself in the delightful expectation of gladdening her mother's heart by her safe arrival. She, too, now swooned away, and, as she was placed on the bed beside her mother, it seemed, indeed, that death, disappointed of his prey on the wild moor, had seized it in the cottage, and by the fireside. The husband knelt down by the bedside, and held his wife's icy hand in his, while William Grieve, appalled and awe-stricken, hung over his Hannah. But Hannah's young heart soon began once more to beat—and soon as she came to her recollection, she rose up with a face whiter than ashes and free from all smiles, as if none had ever played there, and joined her father and lover in their efforts to restore her mother to life.

It was the mercy of heaven that had struck her down to the earth, insensible to the shrieking winds, and the fears that would otherwise have killed her. Three hours of that wild storm had passed over her head, and she heard nothing more than if she had been asleep in a breathless night of the summer dew. Not even a dream had touched her brain, and when she opened her eyes, which, as she thought, had been but a moment shut, she had scarcely time to recall to her recollection the image of her husband rushing out into the storm, and of a daughter therein lost, till she beheld that very husband kneeling tenderly by her bedside, and that very daughter smoothing the pillow on which her aching temples reclined. But she knew from the white steadfast countenances before her that there had been tribulation and deliverance, and she looked on the beloved beings ministering by her bed, as more fearfully dear to her from the unimagined danger from which she felt assured they had been rescued by the arm of the Almighty.

There is little need to speak of returning recollection, and returning strength. They had all now power to weep, and power to pray. The Bible had been lying in its place ready for worship, and the father read aloud that chapter in which is narrated our Saviour's act of miraculous power, by which he saved Peter from the sea. Soon as the solemn thoughts awakened by that act of mercy so similar to that which had rescued themselves from death had subsided, and they had all risen up from prayer, they gathered themselves in gratitude round the little table which had stood so many hours spread—and exhausted nature was strengthened and restored by a frugal and simple meal partaken of in silent thankfulness. The whole story of the night was then calmly recited—and when the mother heard how the stripling had followed her sweet Hannah into the storm, and borne her in his arms through a hundred drifted heaps, and then looked upon her in her pride, so young, so innocent, and so beautiful, she knew, that were the child indeed to become an orphan, there was one, who, if there was either trust in nature, or truth in religion, would guard and cherish her all the days of her life.

It was not nine o'clock when the storm came down from Glen-Srae upon the Black-moos, and now in a pause of silence the clock struck twelve. Within these three hours William and Hannah had led a life of trouble and of joy, that had enlarged and kindled their hearts within them; and they felt that henceforth they were to live wholly for each other's sakes. His love was the proud and exulting love of a deliverer who, under Providence, had saved from the frost and the snow the innocence and the beauty of which his young passionate heart had been so desperately enamoured—and he now thought of his own Hannah Lee ever more moving about in his father's house, not as a servant, but as a daughter—and when some few happy years had gone by, his own most beautiful and most loving wife. The innocent maiden was not ashamed of the holy affection which she now knew that she had long felt for the fearless youth on whose bosom she had thought herself dying in that cold and miserable moor. Her heart leapt within her when she heard her parents bless him by his name—and when he took her hand into his before them, and vowed before that Power who had that night saved them from the snow, that Hannah Lee should ere long be his wedded wife—she wept and sobbed as if her heart would break in a fit of strange and insupportable happiness.

The young shepherd rose to bid them farewell—"My father will think I am lost," said he, with a grave smile, "and my Hannah's mother knows what it is to fear for a child." So nothing was said to detain him, and the family went with him to the door. The skies smiled as serenely as if a storm had never swept before the stars, the moon was sinking from her meridian, but in cloudless splendour, and the hollow of the hills was hushed as that of heaven. Danger there was none over the placid night-scene—the happy youth soon crost the Black-moss, now perfectly still; and, perhaps, just as he was passing, with a shudder of gratitude, the very spot where his sweet Hannah Lee so nearly perished, she was lying down to sleep in her innocence, or dreaming of one now dearer to her than all on earth but her parents. Blackwood.

TURKISH STRATAGEM.

Once upon a time there lived in Hamah a certain Turk called Mustapha, who, having accumulated some wealth by carrying on a trade in goats' hair, determined to make a pilgrimage to Mecca. His family consisted of his wife and two slaves; and as the lady insisted on not being left behind, the good man resolved to sell off his stock of goats' hair, to take all his household with him, and to shut up his house till his return. The only difficulty that presented itself was what to do with his money. He did not like to run the risk of being robbed of it in his journey through the desert, he did not like to leave it in an empty house, and there were not any friends to whom he wished to trust the secret of his wealth. After much deliberation he placed it in separate parcels at the bottom of five large earthen jars, which he then filled up with butter, and on his departure sent them to the house of one of his neighbours, a Jew, named Mousa, to keep till his return, telling him that it was a stock which he had laid in for winter consumption. The Jew, however, from the weight of the jars and other circumstances, suspected that they contained something more valuable; and as soon as Mustapha was fairly on his way to Damascus to join the caravan, he ventured to open them; when finding his expectations realised, he took out the gold and filled them up again with butter so carefully that nobody could tell that they had been disturbed. The poor Turk, on his return from the pilgrimage, soon found out the trick that his neighbour had practised upon him; but as the jars were exactly in the same apparent state as when he had left them, and as there was no evidence as to their contents, it was plain that no legal process could give him any redress. He therefore set about to devise some other way of punishing the Jew, and of recovering, if possible, his property; and in the mean time he did not communicate his loss to any person but his wife, and enjoined on her the strictest secrecy. After long consideration, a plan suggested itself. In one of his visits to the neighbouring town of Homs, where he was in the habit of going to sell his goats' hair to the manufacturers of the mashlakhs, for which that place is famous, he fell in with a troop of gipsies, who had with them an ape of extraordinary sagacity. He prevailed on them to sell him this animal, and conveying it privately to the house at Hamah, shut it up in a room to which no one but himself had access. He then went to the bazaar and bought one of the dark scanty robes and the small caps or kalpaks, with a speckled handkerchief tied closely round it, which is the prescribed costume of the Jews throughout the Turkish empire. This dress he took care invariably to put on whenever he went to visit his ape; and as he always carried him his meals, and indeed never allowed any other person to see him, the animal in the course of a few weeks became extremely attached to him, jumping on his neck and hugging and caressing him as soon as he entered the room. About this time, as he was walking along the streets one day, he met a lad, the son of the Jew Mousa, and having enticed him into his house by the promise of some figs, he shut him up a close prisoner in a detached apartment in his garden, at such a distance from the street and from the other houses in the town, that the boy could not discover to any one the place of his confinement. The Jew, after several days search, not being able to obtain any tidings of him, concluded that he had either been drowned, or had strayed out of the town and fallen into the hands of some wandering Bedouins; and as he was his only child, fell into a state of the greatest despair: till at length he heard by accident, that just about the time that the boy was missing, he had been seen walking in company with Hadgi Mustapha. The truth instantly flashed on his mind, and he recognised in the loss of his son, some stratagem which the Turk had planned in revenge for the affair of the butter-jars. He immediately summoned him before the cadi, accused him of having the boy in his possession, and insisted on his immediately restoring him. Mustapha at first strenuously denied the fact; but when one of the witnesses positively declared that he saw the boy go into his house, and when the cadi was about to pronounce his decree, that he should bring him into the court dead or alive,—“Yah illah, el Allah!” he exclaimed, “there is no God but Allah, and his power is infinite; he can work miracles when it seemeth good in his sight. It is true, effendi,” continued he, addressing himself to the cadi, “that I saw the Jew Mousa's son passing by my house; and for the sake of the old friendship subsisting between his father and myself, I invited him to come in to eat some figs which I had just been gathering. The boy, however, repaid my hospitality with rudeness and abuse: nay, he even blasphemed the name of our holy prophet; but scarcely had the words passed his lips, when, to my surprise and horror, he was suddenly changed into a monkey. In that form I will produce him; and as a proof that what I tell you is true, you will see that he will immediately recognise his father.” At this instant a servant who was waiting on the outside let loose the ape into the divan, who seeing that the Jew was the only person present in the dress to which he was accustomed, mistook him for his master, jumped upon him, and clung round his neck with all the expressions of fondness which the child might have been supposed to exhibit on being restored to his parent. Nothing more was wanting to convince the audience of the truth of Mustapha's story; “A miracle, a real miracle!” they cried out, “great is Allah, and Mahomet is his prophet:” and the Jew was ordered to take the monkey and retire from the court. A compromise was now his only resource; and accordingly, as soon as it was dark, and he could go unobserved, he repaired to Mustapha's house, and offered, if he would liberate his son, to restore all the money which he had taken from the butter-jars. The Turk having attained his object, consented to release the prisoner; but in order to keep up his own credit, he stipulated that the child should be removed privately, and that his father, with his whole family, should immediately quit the place. The popular belief in the miracle thus remained unshaken; and so great was the disrepute into which the Jews fell in consequence of this adventure, that they all departed one after the other, and none have ever since been known to reside in Hamah. London Sun.

EXTRACT FROM A LOG-BOOK.

The following is an extract from the log-book of an emigrant, proceeding to the Swan river, dated Cape of Good Hope, December 10th, 1829.

“October 14, in 19 degrees, fell in with a shoal of sharks, which played round the vessel to the annoyance of the sailors, who are rather superstitious, and consider such visitors as ominous of evil, and which indeed proved too true. At mid-day, all the gentlemen were busily employed (it being a dead calm) in baiting hooks to catch sharks, and one of them soon took the bait. The fish was full eighteen feet in length, and in floundering to disentangle itself, caused so much sport that several passengers crowded into the captain's boat, which hung suspended over the stern of the ship. Suddenly they all got to the head of the boat to see the shark hauled under the stern of the vessel, struggling with the line. In a moment the quarter davit on the starboard side of the vessel broke off and let one end of the boat down, precipitating every soul in it into the sea among the sharks. Here was a scene of horror! The captain was in midship when it happened. I was busily employed at my tents under the tuition of the boatswain, but, like the rest, when the shark was caught, left my occupation to witness the sport, but Providence guided me to a point of safety. The boatswain had slung himself by a rope and lowered himself to the surface of the water, with the harpoon in his hand ready to strike the fish, at the very instant the accident happened. Young Williams followed me, but not satisfied with the view, he hastily climbed up the side of the cabin, and was the last that jumped into the unlucky boat, and made up the number of twelve persons struggling in the sea among the sharks. Our captain was almost beside himself—all hands commenced throwing out ropes, loose spars, oars, and every buoyant article we could lay hands on for them to cling to. Fortunately it was a dead calm, or every soul must have perished—our vessel only drifted by the little current of the sea. I saved one lad by throwing over a knife-board which the cabin-boy had been using; my man Hibberd threw over an Indian mat. Master Shaw, a young gentleman about thirteen got upon it, and was three miles astern of us before we could reach him with the boat, which was instantly manned and launched. I saved Mr. Earl's footman, who could swim, but was so exhausted from fear of the sharks that he was sinking, when I dragged the line the shark was attached to across him, and he had the presence of mind to put the cord between his teeth, when I hauled him within reach of a rope with a loop, by which we hauled him safe up. Mr. Peter Shadwell was also actively employed; he is in the East India company's service, and is a brother of the vice-chancellor; after half an hour's exertion, all were saved but two. I lament to say Williams was one of the unfortunates. I saw him sink to rise no more. He had hold of an oar, but lost his balance—he slipped it, and actually flung his arms round the captured shark (which was now pulled up to the surface of the water) to save himself; but when he found out what he had hold of, he was so horror-struck that he called me by name, “Oh my God! my God! witness my end!” and down he sank to rise no more. The other sufferer was a fine healthy country boy. Thus two lives were lost to answer the confirmation of the sailor's omen, that sharks always prognosticate signs of death or some evil to the ship—thus it proved. This indeed was a tragic day. The fish, line, and all, drifted away, and we all returned thanks to God for allowing us to save the other ten.” Litchfield Mercury.

SUPERSTITION AND CRUELTY.

Whether we confine our observation to Christendom or not, superstition and cruelty will often, if not generally, be found inseparable companions. The following sketch of a horrid transaction is no fiction; but it will afford some satisfaction to the philanthropic to learn that the person who caused the death of an innocent wife (as will appear in the sequel) is gradually throwing off the trammels of superstition, and will probably introduce a policy more enlightened than that which has so long obscured and blackened the character of the Turks.

A distinguished German traveller, who spent considerable time in Constantinople about four years ago, received very kind treatment from the sultan. All the rites of hospitality, and all the offices of friendship, were bestowed with a spirit of frankness and a cordiality of feeling which would do honour to the most enlightened christian ruler. Nothing was omitted by the sultan which could contribute to the comfort or happiness of the traveller, or enrich his store of information on the various subjects to which his researches were directed; and as gratitude is one of the most pleasing emotions that warm the bosom, favours so distinguished from the sultan did not fail to awaken in the heart of the German the most lively and most grateful sentiments.

After the traveller had finished his oriental tour, and returned again to Germany, he was desirous of transmitting to the sultan some tokens of affectionate remembrance for the polite and generous attentions he had received. But it is a principle with the Turks, when they receive a present always to return one equal in value, and often one far superior. This principle the German wished to evade—he did not wish to send a present of the value of a few hundred dollars to one to whom he was under so many obligations, and receive one in return of much greater worth. He had made his arrangements to send his present by an Englishman, who commanded a brig then in one of the ports of the Baltic, and which was bound to the Black sea. The German enjoined upon the bearer of his present not to receive a present in return from the sultan.

When the English captain arrived at Constantinople, after an interview with the reis effendi,* he was introduced to the sultan, to whom, by an interpreter, he communicated his message from the German traveller. But so fixed is the sentiment in the mind of a Turk that presents must be reciprocated, that the sultan appeared hardly to understand it as a thing possible to receive the gift of his distant friend, without making a splendid return. But after further explanation, adverting to the many favours the German had formerly received at the hands of the sultan, he consented to accept the present, not however, without insisting that the captain who had brought it should receive one on his own account, if he could not receive one to carry back to the German. The sultan was then informed that the captain had been rewarded for bringing the present by him who sent it; still, he could not be satisfied without making some return to the captain.

As the sultan seemed to be determined that the captain should have some remuneration, the latter requested as a very important favour, to see the favourite wife, or one of the favourite wives of the sultan. With much apparent willingness the request was granted; and a female was soon introduced into their presence, her face entirely concealed by a veil, and she approached the sultan and kneeled. He extended his hand and took hers, and with the other hand raised her veil. As her eyes fell on the Englishman her countenance changed, and her whole frame trembled. This, to the captain, was altogether unaccountable; being ignorant that the sultan's wife, in the estimation of her superstitious lord, would be defiled by looking on a christian, and would forfeit her life by this act of obedience to his mandate. Well may the wife of a sultan shudder when unveiled in the presence of a christian, knowing that she will be immediately led to the scaffold to expiate the offence. Soon after the interview which cost an innocent woman her life, the Englishman had some business to transact with the reis effendi; and when he remarked that he had just received a favour, perhaps not frequently granted to foreigners, that of seeing the sultan's favourite wife, judge of his utter astonishment and horror, when the reis effendi replied—"I knew before that you had seen her; and for polluting herself by looking on you, her head was cut off fifteen minutes ago!" Shocked with the atrocity, he regretted, but in vain, that his curiosity had led him to ask a favour which produced a result so despotic, inhuman, and tragical.*

* Secretary of state for foreign affairs.

RIDING.

Pulmonary complaints, and cases of general debility, are benefited by riding on horseback.

"To render riding on horseback effectual in a consumption," says Dr. Rush, "it should be continued with moderate intervals from six to twelve months. It should be repeated every two or three years, till the patient has passed the consumptive stages of life; nay, he must do more; he must acquire a habit of riding constantly, both at home and abroad."

We have witnessed the good effects of riding on horseback in many instances, and feel warranted to say, that if properly used, it is radically effective in cases of debility indicated by nervous affections. Riding on horseback, and sea-sickness, have cured more pulmonary affections than the whole catalogue of drugs, medicines, syrups, and panaceas.

The great majority of female complaints arise mainly from a want of proper exercise. This cannot be effected by mere muscular motion, as walking, sailing, or riding in an easy carriage. The viscera require an extraordinary degree of motion or agitation to keep them safe from the influence of slight changes of atmosphere or diet, as well as the tree, shrub, or plant does of the wind or storm that often agitates its frame to almost apparent destruction. To those who live in crowded cities, many necessary and healthy exercises are denied, and that more especially to females, who are consequently the most numerous class of victims to nervous and debilitated affections. A late visit to Mr. Blyth's riding school, at Tattersall's, in Broadway, suggested to us a remedy for this growing evil, and we cannot, in justice to humanity, forbear to recommend to our fair readers to avail themselves of this no less pleasant than healthy exercise, to give tone and vigour to their tender frames. Mr. B. seems to be perfectly master of his profession. When health can be obtained and preserved, while contributing to our own pleasure and gratification as well as the accomplishment of easy motions and elegant carriage, it is our own fault if we become nervous, dyspeptic, and hypochondriac.

Mr. Blyth's grounds are well calculated to answer every purpose for necessary exercise. It is an oblong square, (so called) or, in equestrian language, a "complete manage," quite preferable in many respects to a circle. If fathers and guardians would pay more money to educate their daughters in a riding school, and less in a boarding school, they would find more "sound minds in sound bodies," than the fact of every day's observation establishes. When the body is weak or enervate, the mind, however well disciplined and cultivated, is restless, peevish, and discontented, and becomes itself a source of diseased reaction on the corporeal system.—In short, riding on horseback is a branch of education that deserves attention in our populous cities. Medical Inquirer.

ROBERT OWEN IN ENGLAND.

During the last three or four weeks, Mr. Owen, of New-Lanark, and sundry other places, has been leading the columns of the London newspapers with "Addresses to the British Nation;" all setting forth his peculiar views, and containing arguments—we suppose they are at least meant to be such—in favour of his newly discovered plans for placing human beings on a par, as to moral and intellectual perfection, with the cherubim and seraphim. Most of our readers are doubtless acquainted with the nature of his air-built schemes, and some of them, perhaps, aware, that if his system of equality be not less extensive than the four quarters of this globe, he condescends to propose that an experiment shall be made upon a small scale—that at first, Great-Britain with its dependencies only, shall be submitted to his rule and governance, and that at once all distinctions of society shall be abolished, all modes of faith become extinct, all such prejudices as doctrine in religion have an end, together with some other trifling matters, such as matrimony, for example, and that mankind shall become pure and spotless, by the aid of that unerring guide, reason; beautiful and good by the help of the unsullied teacher, self-interest; and happy and immortal, because they deserve to be so; working out their own salvation, without either fear or trembling.

* For the principal facts contained in the foregoing sketch, we are indebted—says the Nantucket Inquirer—to a gentleman recently from Smyrna, where the story is well authenticated.

What a piece of work is man! and what a piece of work does a man make of nothing, or worse than nothing. We know Mr. Owen is not a fool; yet he is vainly fancying that the world listens to his silly ravings, and that those who do not laugh are converts; and that those who openly oppose him, must become converts in the end. He is actually, at this moment, and has been for some time past, under the firm and fixed belief, that another year will not pass over his head, before his plans are universally adopted, and all his wild dreams become sober realities. The following is extracted from one of his addresses; it is the corner-stone of the temple he is about to raise. "The plan recommended is to supersede the vicious circumstances which pervade the moral, political, and commercial system now in practice, by other circumstances of more favourable character, formed in accordance with the now ascertained law of human nature, that belief and feeling are alike independent of the will of the individual. Such a combination of circumstances would at once relieve the world from all the misery entailed upon it, by the consequences arising from a contrary supposition, which supposition could only have been upheld through past ages, by reason of the ignorance which pervaded the human race, upon those all-important subjects."

British Magazine.

JONATHAN'S WATCH TRADE.

A smart young chap who lives away "down east," gives the following account of his first "venture" after arriving in Boston. "Nothing happened worth mentioning on the road, nor till next morning after I got here and put up in Elm-street. I then got off my watch pretty curiously, as you shall be informed. I was down in the bar-room and thought it well enough to look pretty considerably smart, and now and then compared my watch with the clock in the bar, and found it as near right as ever it was—when a fellow stepped up to me and asked how I'd trade? and says I, for what? and says he, for your watch—and says I, any way that will be a fair shake. Upon that, says he, I'll give you my watch and five dollars. Says I, it's done! He gave me five dollars, and I gave him my watch. Now, says I, give me your watch; and says he, with a loud laugh, I can't got none—and that kind atum'd the laugh on me. Thinks I let them laugh that lose. Soon as the laugh was well over, the feller thought he'd try the watch to his ear—why, says he, it don't go—no, said I, not without it's carried—then I began to laugh—he tried to open it and couldn't start it a hair, and broke his thumb nail into the bargain. Won't she open? says he. Not's I know on, says I; then the laugh seemed to take another turn. Don't you think I got off old Britannia, pretty well considering?"

CHARACTER OF A WELL-BRED MAN.

Some have supposed the fine gentleman and the well-bred to be synonymous terms; but I will make it appear that nothing can be more widely different; the former leaves nature entirely, the latter improves upon her. He is neither a slave nor an enemy to pleasure, but approves as his reason shall direct. He is above stooping to flatter a knave, though in an exalted station; nor overlooks merit, though he should find it in a cottage. His behaviour is affable and respectful, yet not cringing or formal; and his manners easy and unaffected. He misses no opportunity wherein he can oblige his friends, yet does it in so delicate a manner that he seems rather to have received than conferred a favour. He does not profess a passion he never felt, to impose upon the credulity of a simple woman, nor will he injure another's reputation to please her vanity. He cannot love where he does not esteem, nor ever suffers his passions to overcome his reason. In his friendship he is steady and sincere, and lives less for himself than his friend.

Letter from a Lady.

BERNADOTTE.

A Swedish peasant spoke contemptuously of the king, saying—"I don't care a fig for Bernadotte." The peasant was arrested, and under an ancient law of the kingdom, condemned to death. The king immediately pardoned the peasant, and ordered the law to be repealed. "But," said the king to the judge, "I do not like to be insulted, and therefore I cannot let this man pass off without some punishment: you will therefore please to go to his house, and say to him in my name—'Since you don't care a fig for Bernadotte, Bernadotte don't care a fig for you.'"

An itinerant preacher, who rambled in his sermons, when requested to stick to the text, replied, that "scattering shot hit the most birds."

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

In glancing over the motley mass of printed sheets with which we exchange, amid the satisfactory quantity of praise which has been freely and cheerfully awarded us by the leading journals in our principal cities, we here and there perceive a sprinkling of impotent abuse in a few papers of rather equivocal character. To this we do not object. Success will always engender envy and bad feeling in little minds, and why should we hope to escape scot-free more than others? Whatever may be the ostensible reason assigned for these attacks, we know that the real cause is the rapidly increasing circulation of the Mirror. This, and this alone, is the unpardonable offence which cannot be forgiven by decayed and decaying journals; and this being the case, we can well afford to regard with calmness those ebullitions of petty malice which the natural course of pecuniary operations will soon silence for ever: before being consigned over to the tender attentions of their creditors, the editors of those sorry affairs naturally desire, like dying reptiles, to spit their expiring venom on those who have been more fortunate than themselves, and we think they ought to be indulged in this their last gratification, as it cannot possibly harm any one. Our respectable and thriving competitors have never evinced ought towards us but civility and gentlemanly courtesy, which we have done our best to deserve; and as for those who will soon be no more, we do not desire to accelerate their latter end even by a paragraph. Peace be with them.

One of our opponents—no, not our opponents—but one of our revilers, who has gained some little notoriety by his extraordinary and Pistolonian manner of putting the English language together, is extremely desirous that we should bring him further into notice by replying to his incomprehensibilities. We really have every desire to do a good-natured turn towards an unfortunate being, but are prevented in consequence of his improper use of adjectives, we having made a resolution in the commencement of our career, never to reply to any person that used more than four adjectives per line; this gentleman averages six, so that the public will at once perceive the utter impossibility of our complying with his wishes.

Music.—We are glad to perceive that both here and in England, great exertions are making for the further advancement of this delightful science. In London, a new and magnificent institute has sprung up entitled the "Panarmonion," principally devoted to instruction in singing, but also including dancing and elocution. Such an establishment cannot fail in producing the most striking effects, as it is to be superintended by the celebrated Signor Gesualdo Lanza, a professor who has been more successful in the education of his pupils than perhaps any other, and has been instrumental in bringing forward some of the brightest ornaments of the English stage. We subjoin a small portion of the prospectus:

"The vocal department of this establishment will be composed of twenty-four ladies and twenty-four gentlemen, who will be taught by Signor Gesualdo Lanza, assisted by his professional pupils, and will be thoroughly instructed in the vocal department of the drama, for oratorio performances, and for public concerts, on the most approved and scientific principles: upon a system, the merits of which will be duly appreciated, when is considered the brilliant success of the under-mentioned distinguished vocalists, who were the pupils of Signor Lanza: Mrs. Austin, late of the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, now in America; Miss Bolton, ditto, ditto, now Lady Thurlow; Miss Herbert, of the Theatre Royal, Covent Garden; Miss Mori, formerly of the Italian Opera, now of the Opera House, Paris; Miss Stephens, of the Theatres Royal, Drury Lane and Covent Garden; Miss M. Tree, formerly of the Theatre Royal, Covent Garden; Mr. Duruset, of the Theatre Royal, Covent Garden; Mr. J. Smith, of the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, &c."

The ballet department will be under the direction of Noble, and other eminent instructors in saltatory evolutions.

To Correspondents.—L. G. W. must at once perceive the obvious impropriety, not to say indelicacy, which would attach to the publication in this miscellany, of his well written and better meant notice of its general character and merits. We sincerely thank him for the expression of his kind feelings—and, on most other subjects, we shall cheerfully gratify our vanity by publishing any communication from his fluent pen.

Concert.—Miss Sterling's concert will take place on Tuesday next at Masonic Hall. The Misses Gillingham, Etienne, Schott, Hansen, and other distinguished professors have volunteered their services.

Orphan Asylum.—The amount received on Sunday last at St. Patrick's cathedral, in behalf of the orphan asylum, Prince-street, amounted to four hundred and seven dollars.

WHEN FORCED FROM DEAR HEBE TO GO.

COMPOSED BY DR. ARNE.

AFFETUOSO.

When forc'd from dear He be to go, What an - guish I felt at my heart, And I thought, but it might not be so, She was sor - ry to see me de - part; She cast such a lan - guish - ing view, My path I could scarce - ly dis - cern, So sweet - ly she bade me a - dieu I thought that she bade me re - turn, I thought that she bade me re - turn.

SECOND VERSE.

To see, as my fair one pass'd by,
Some hermit peep out of his cell,
How he thinks of his youth with a sigh,
How fondly he wishes her well;
On him she may smile, if she please,
It will warm the cold bosom of age,
But cease, gentle Hebe, O cease,
Such softness would ruin the sage.

VARIETIES.

HISTORY OF NAVAL UNIFORM IN ENGLAND.—A very curious paper was recently read before the Society of Antiquaries by Mr. Ellis. In the time of Queen Elizabeth, it appeared from this communication, the commanders were ordered to dress in scarlet, which they continued to do by royal ordinance until the Commonwealth, and from that period till the time of George the Second, naval officers dressed according to their own fancies, each commander of a vessel having a whim in costume of his own. A letter on the same subject was also read by Mr. Locker, of Greenwich Hospital, who states that the present naval uniform (blue, faced with white) was ordered by George the Second, in consequence of observing the effect of those blended colours in a riding-dress of the dutchess of Bedford. Epaulettes, it seems, are quite a modern invention, inasmuch, that Nelson, in the early part of his life, threatened to cut two of his naval friends, as intolerable coxcombs, merely because they mounted epaulettes.

THE BIRDS OF AMERICA.—We have been highly gratified, says a late English paper, by inspecting some beautiful and highly-finished engravings of the birds of America, from drawings made on the spot, by John James Audubon, a celebrated naturalist, possessed not only of science, but feeling and taste. Where a difference of plumage exists between the sexes, both the male and female birds have been represented; in many instances they are beautifully grouped in their respective avocations. The size of the work is double-elephant, and the birds are nearly as large as life. Where all are eminently attractive, it is almost invidious to particularize. To those who derive pleasure from the study of natural history, that highway to the throne of the Almighty Creator of the glorious eagle and the fairy humming-bird, such a work is invaluable; and to those who without being scientific, love to gaze upon the works of God, and "gazing to adore," Mr. Audubon's productions must prove a never-ending source of interest and amusement. The drawings are published by Mr. R. Havell, jun. in Newman-street.

NEW SYSTEM OF EDUCATION.—A vast degree of attention has been for some time excited on the continent, to the merits of a new system of education, of which M. Jacotot, of Louvain, is the inventor and founder. He terms it "Universal Instruction," from the fact, that its principles admit of application to every subject in the universe of knowledge. This system, indeed, presents what had never before been presented, an harmonious whole, which although of remarkably simple machinery, is yet of astonishing energy. A pamphlet has just made its appearance in London, the intention of which is to furnish a complete general notion of the principles and method of this new system, from the operation of which, the most marvellous results have been undeniably obtained. If a royal road to learning be in the nature of things accessible, Jacotot has assuredly discovered it.

SCOTT'S LIFE OF NAPOLEON.—The last Foreign Quarterly Review tells us, that though every one of Sir Walter Scott's novels has been translated into Polish, yet so much are the Poles and Sir Walter at issue with respect to the character of Napoleon, that not a single bookseller can be found in Poland courageous enough to advertise a translation of the celebrated Life of Bonaparte.

LITERARY CLUB.—Mr. Campbell, the poet, is busily employed in organizing a club to be composed principally of literary men, and thence to be called the Literary Club. No man of the present day could be found to unite a greater number of the qualities necessary to succeed in such an undertaking than Mr. Campbell himself.

EXTRAORDINARY AND HORRIBLE EVENT.—The following occurrence has recently thrown a family of respectability in Paris into the deepest affliction. Mlle. C. had suffered severely and long from a pulmonary complaint, which had been pronounced by her medical advisers likely to terminate in death in a few days. The eldest of her three brothers, a professor at one of the principal colleges, overwhelmed at the sight of the protracted sufferings of a sister whom he tenderly loved, formed the resolution of at once putting an end to them: and, with this wild idea, went to the house of their parents, killed her with a pistol-shot, and fled. He left a letter behind, announcing that when it was opened, he himself would be no longer living, and entreating that he might be buried with his sister. A few hours afterwards, his parents received intelligence of his having entered the house of a friend, where he executed his purpose by blowing out his brains.

MARCH OF INNOVATION.—If it be true that an Italian theatre is about to be established at Constantinople, it may lead to an important change in the opinions and habits of the Moslems. Women, not only unveiled, but exhibiting themselves on an open stage, while the rest of the sex, assembled in public, are exposed to the gaze of grave Mahometans, grinning Franks, and other dogs, who may choose to pay a piastre for a stare at the beauties of Georgia and Circassia—this is a step in the march of innovation scarcely to be credited

GEORGE P. MORRIS, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

Published every Saturday, at the corner of Nassau and Ann streets.—Terms four dollars per annum, payable in advance.—No subscription received for a less period than one year.

J. SEYMOUR, PRINTER, JOHN-STREET.

NEW-YORK MIRROR.

AND LADIES' LITERARY GAZETTE.

VOLUME VII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 26, 1880.

NUMBER 51.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

CHANGES.

We meet in the sunshine of gladness
To brighten our memory's chain,
We part in the twilight of sadness,
Perchance to meet never again.

From the hearth of our childhood we sever,
In the land of the stranger to dwell,
To the friends of our bosom for ever
We whisper the parting farewell.

And yet, o'er the stretch of the billow,
As lonely and cheerless we roam,
In dreams by our wave-circled pillow,
We hear the sweet voices of home.

Though the shroud and the green sward may cover
The fond hearts that shined us so deep,
Yet in visions their spirits shall hover,
Like angels of light o'er our sleep.

Then joy! for those visits betoken
A being o'er death's wide domain!
Be the links of affection all broken,
The future shall join them again.

Oh yes, though parted we wander
In sadness down life's farthest slope,
While darkly our memories ponder
O'er all the lost pleiads of hope.

Though chill to our coffinless bosom
The ice of the arctic shall cling,
Or flowers round our sepulchres blossom,
Where sweetly the tropic birds sing:

Yet when from their mouldering cerements
The trumpet-roused sleepers shall start,
In the thrill of remembered endearments,
We shall meet—may we meet not to part! PROTEUS.

VERSES,

Written among the Alleghany Mountains in Virginia.

How calm and glorious is the hour of night
In these uncultured solitary wilds,
When o'er each lowly vale and lofty height,
The full-orb'd moon in cloudless lustre smiles.

Those lofty mountains with their forests' green,
And craggy summits towering to the sky,
How proudly do they rise o'er all the scene,
And lift the thoughts from earth, to muse on high.

And yon pure rivolet that pours along,
Playing and sparkling in the moonbeams clear;
How sweet the music of its vesper song
In changeful cadence falls upon the ear.

And hark, the roar of those far-spreading woods,
Sinking or rising as the winds sweep by;
Myriads of voices fill these solitudes,
And send the notes of melody on high:

While all his works with one accord rejoice
And pour forth praises to the Great Supreme,
Shall man, unmoved, withhold his nobler voice,
Nor glow with raptures on the glorious theme?

His bounteous goodness all creation fills,
Even those wild woods where solitude prevails;
He sends his dews upon the untrodden hills,
And flowers he scatters o'er the lonely vales.

Scenes unfrequented by the feet of men
Display his goodness and proclaim his might;
He feeds the wild-deer in the secret glen,
And the young eagles on the craggy height.

His mighty hand the vivid lightning speeds,
And bursts the clouds that o'er the hills impend,
The mountain stream through distant lands he leads,
And joy and melody his steps attend.

To trace his wonders through each varying clime,
And all his mercies to the sons of men;
Fills the rapt soul with ecstasy sublime,
Beyond the efforts of the poet's pen.

Oh, solitude, how blissful are the hours
Among thy shades in heavenly musing past,
When nature leads us through her secret bowers,
And contemplation spreads the rich repast!

Amid the haunts of men the thoughtful mind,
That fain would soar above the things of earth,
Finds her bold flight on every hand confined
By care distracted, and seduced by mirth.

But in the deep and solemn hour of night
The soul luxuriates in a scene like this,

From cliff to cliff she wings her daring flight
O'er foaming cataract, or dark abyss:
Or else uplifted o'er the things of time,
By heavenly faith from all her bonds set free
Among the fields of ether treads sublime,
And holds communion with the Deity.

Oh! how transporting is the glorious thought,
That He, whose power controls yon worlds above,
Is ever nigh—and ever found when sought
To save and bless us with a father's love.

Even his chastisements are with kindness fraught,
And seal instruction on th' attentive mind;
Driven by disease, these distant shades I sought,
And all the fruitless cares of life resigned.

'Twas then He met me and in mercy heal'd
The raging fever that my strength deprest;
His love paternal to my soul revealed,
And swelled the tide of rapture in my breast.

Then oh, my heart, mayst thou continual turn
To Him whose power alone can guide thy ways;
May love divine upon thy altar burn,
And every thought and feeling speak his praise.

ELEGIAC STANZAS.

Oh thou lamented, absent one,
To thee my thoughts would stray,
In evening's consecrated hour,
Or mid the pomp of day.

Thine image is before me now,
Oh, would it ne'er depart!
That gentle mien, that angel smile,
Are graven on my heart.

From fancy in the festal hall
Thy fairy form recedes;
Thou art not at our trysting place,
And stricken memory bleeds.

And when thy favourite song is breathed,
In well-remembered tone,
Thy voice upon its echo floats,
But where art thou—my own?

What was the strong, though nameless spell,
That bound my heart to thee?
It was not beauty, for around
I many fairer see.

It was a meek and holy charm,
An intellectual grace,
A mind of purity and truth,
More lovely than thy face.

How oft from revelry and mirth,
My wayward heart would flee
To solitude, whose musing thoughts
Would give thee back to me.

Beloved! though this cherished pain
Now sheds its blight o'er all,
I would not from its rest above,
Thy gentle spirit call.

And yet while on life's faithless sea
My sinking heart is lost,
How could I cease to sigh for thee,
For thee, the loved and lost!

Thou'rt gone, and what remains to me?
Life's silver chain is riven—
Oh that I soon away may flee,
And reach thy home in heaven!

ELOISA.

ORIGINAL TALES.

A SKETCH.

But love, first learned in a lady's eyes,
Lives not alone immured in the brain;
But, with the motion of all elements,
Courses as swift as thought in every power;
And giveth every power a double power
Above their functions and their offices.—Shaks.

TRAFFIC was a young merchant, possessing considerable property and some personal beauty. He was well known for his steady habits, his strict attention to business, his scrupulous punctuality, his rigid integrity, and his wary prudence. He was prompt in his appearance on 'change—not a moment too late—as regular as the town clock—his word was like a covenant—his promise like a bond. With all these excellent qualities he was the most abject miser on earth; avarice was his ruling principle, money his polar star. This passion had, like a deadly mildew, blighted all the finer feelings of his nature, and turned "the milk of human kindness" into corrosive poison. In vain did the feeble voice of distress and the soul-piercing cry of misery appeal to his adamant bosom. In vain did the forlorn orphan and the famished widow crave a morsel of his bread; they were rudely repulsed from his inhospitable door, and their importunities denounced with a bitter curse. Traffic was a grovelling niggard both in principle and practice; he never spent a farthing but through absolute necessity. No pleasure, however seducing, no amusement, however attractive, if its enjoyment cost the most insignificant trifle, possessed charms sufficient to allure him. He lived on a system of the most rigid economy, of which his personal appearance in particular, gave the fullest indications. His hat (to begin with the most conspicuous article of his dress) dated its existence several years back. Its hue had probably once been a jet black, but through excessive wear and exposure to the inclemency of the weather, it had become a fiery red; it had also apparently lost its pristine shape, and now began to exhibit the most striking symptoms of a rapid dissolution. His modest black coat had descended through three successive generations, and was by no means the least singular part of his dress; it was perfectly threadbare, and as devoid of nap, as the deserts of Arabia are said to be of verdure and vegetation; its cut was also very odd, so much so, that divers persons, skilled in the art of making habiliments, repeatedly declared that they had never seen a vestment of similar form. In addition to this, there were also in it three or four rents of divers dimensions, which had evidently been repaired by some individual not expert in the mystery of the needle. His vest, bespattered with ink of various hues, and his yellow coloured trousers, "a world too wide," laid claim to antiquity as justly as any other item of his dress. And then last, not least, his crimson stockings, unseemingly darned in some places with yellow yarn, and his ponderous shoes, well fortified on the soles with nails of uncommon size, and ornamented with a pair of huge buckles of glittering brass, completed a picture of more than ordinary interest. He also kept a half-starved servant, whose stomach was seldom or never free from a very disagreeable sensation, called hunger, and whose meagre looks bore abundant evidence of his master's thrifty management. This servant was obliged to work for bare bed and board, if a dirty mattress, a little pork and a few cold potatoes can be dignified with the name. He was a factotum in the household, that is to say, he cooked his master's victuals, cleaned his boots, brushed his clothes, cut his hair, and, in short, performed a number of other operations too tedious to mention.

Traffic was a regular church-going man. He usually listened to the sermon with the deepest attention, and seemed to have his heart engrossed with the solemnity of the subject. His keen, hazel eye, instead of roving from place to place, and amusing itself with a variety of objects, was continually riveted on the parson. One Sunday afternoon, as he was thus sitting in his pew, his eye fixed on the pulpit and his mind apparently absorbed in profound meditation, a beautiful form in white rustled by him; a rich fragrance scented the air and made it an elysium of delight! Curiosity, that all-powerful stimulus, for once kindled itself in his breast, and he mechanically turned his gaze from the parson to the fair object that flitted before him like a fairy elf. Heavens! what symmetry of form! what beauty! what perfection met his wondering eye! The icy heart of our hero was dissolved at the sight; he began to feel the influence of some strange power, and to find a passion—a feeling, hitherto new, hitherto unknown, raising within his labouring breast, and enthralling every faculty. In vain did he strive to compose himself, and collect his scattered senses; all his endeavours proved fruitless, and only tended to render his perturbation the more visible. Neither the parson nor the sermon had now any more charms for him; the recollection of both had apparently been swallowed up in the vortex of this new emotion. His eye instinctively stole another glance of the fair object, who was now seated. What soul-thrilling delight did that single glance convey! what ecstatic rapture did it dart through the frame! what angelic fascination did it impart to every sense! But why attempt to describe that which beggars description? Why attempt, with the cold monumental imagery of words, to define that which neither the tongue can express nor the imagination conceive? Suffice it to say that Traffic was in love; desperately so, for the first time in his life. The more he gazed, the more he became enraptured—every moment disclosed some latent charm and brought to view some hidden grace. Yes, reader, the omnipotent god of love had entered the citadel of his heart, had routed the host of niggard passions which defended it, and dispelled the icy chilliness which so long had frozen the "genial current of his soul." At the conclusion of the service our hero left the church, and shaped his course homewards like an automaton. He walked unusually slow, his hands lodged in his deep pockets, and his eyes intently fixed on the ground, probably musing on the events of the afternoon. In his mental aberrations he would, now and then, significantly shake his head, and sometimes accompany that movement with a huge shrug of his shoulders, to the no small entertainment of divers persons, whose gravity was very much relaxed at the sight. Upon reaching his door he gave a thundering rap, which made his little tenement shake to its foundation. Quick (the servant) having consigned himself to the arms of Morpheus, seemed in no haste to make his appearance, and it was not until Traffic preferred several vigorous applications to the door with his foot that he obtained admission. Therefore, as soon as the door opened, he bestowed sundry lusty blows and kicks upon the ribs of his servant, and exhibited various other tokens of displeasure, the effects of which poor Quick felt for many days afterwards. After having thus compensated his domestic for his vigilance, the love-sick merchant seated himself at supper; but although his appetite was exceedingly good, yet on this occasion he could not taste a morsel. His heart was so full, and his thoughts so much engaged with the fair being who had attracted his attention in church, that he loathed the very idea of nourishment. He went to bed in hopes that sleep would soon free him from the disquietude of mind under which he laboured. But in this he found himself deceived; in vain did he court repose and seek to bury his uneasiness in a temporary oblivion. The short intervals of slumber which he enjoyed were constantly haunted with the image of his charmer. He tossed himself from side to side, spent the live-long night in a state of feverish restlessness, and rose unrefreshed in mind and body, just as the sun began to show his laughing face to this nether world. He hastily dressed himself, and in so doing, committed a multitude of grievous blunders, solely incident to poor wights who are "head over ears in love." He mistook his white neckcloth for a napkin, and soiled it considerably before he discovered the mistake; he buckled on his shoes, entirely forgetting first to put on his crimson stockings, and concluded by wearing his white vest wrong side out, thereby exhibiting a figure irresistibly droll.

Quick, upon seeing his master, with difficulty restrained his laughter. Mustering up all the gravity in his power, he briefly apprised our hero of the strangeness of his dress, and suggested the propriety of rectifying it. The latter, upon viewing himself, confessed the justness of the remark with a woful grin, and began to put his exterior to rights with all possible expedition. This done, he ordered breakfast—but he might as well have attempted to swallow a camel, as to eat a mouthful of food; his appetite was gone. The fact is, reader, his distemper (if love can be so termed) was every moment taking deeper root, and gaining new strength. In despair, he sallied down into his office, opened his ledger, and began to cast up accounts; but, singular to relate, he made blunder after blunder, blot after blot, and erasure after erasure, to the great disfiguration of his hitherto clean and spotless pages. He then started for 'change, found he was half an hour too soon, and so turned back: got home, dropped into a reverie, fell asleep, and dreamt of his unknown; when he awoke, he found himself an hour too late, wondered how the deuce it could have happened, and concluded with muttering a string of curses upon his reckless stupidity.

But why do I attempt to portray the countless operations of love, step by step? It would require a much abler genius, and a far more skilful pen than mine. I therefore leave it to thy fertile imagination to conceive how much our hero was pestered with his new passion both day and night, and how many tender sighs, heart-rending moans, and doleful ejaculations (all indicative of disconsolate love) were emitted from his anguished bosom. Suffice it to say, that Traffic, in a few days became an altered man—he forgot his engagements, neglected his speculations, was not seen in Wall street, and in truth, was unusually remiss in his business. He spent the week in a state of the utmost impatience. In short, he awaited the arrival of the approaching Sunday with the greatest eagerness, and his warm imagination already pictured to itself the thrilling rapture, and the ineffable delight attendant on successful love.

He was not, however, so deeply in love as not to perceive the necessity of amending his external appearance; being well aware that a dazzling exterior, more than any thing else, was calculated to captivate the eye, and make a permanent impression on the heart of the fair. He therefore repaired to a neighbouring tailor (whose matchless skill the trump of fame had blazoned forth, both far and wide) and without any ceremony, desired him to make him a suit of clothes with the utmost dispatch. The man of the needle, with a profound bow, and a reverential scrape of his foot, intimated his acquiescence, and instantly commenced operations by measuring the dimensions of his customer. This done, the latter bid the knight of the thimble good by, and directed his steps to a barber's shop, where his hair was soon arranged in systematic order; much to the satisfaction of Traffic, who, upon consulting a mirror, declared that Quick was the most arrant bungler on the face of the earth, and was not fit to cut the tail of a mountain cat.

After passing a variety of extravagant encomiums on the barber's skill, the lover returned home, much pleased with his appearance. The remainder of the week was spent in making arrangements for the ensuing Sunday.

The "eventful day" at length arrived. He rose at the peep of dawn, full of all the eager impatience which lovers, in similar circumstances, are so apt to feel: never was he in better humour. After spending considerable time at his toilette, arraying himself in his new clothes, and surveying himself from head to foot several times with extreme complacency, he called up his servant. And now, gentle reader, you will at once perceive, that the sweet angel of love had rooted up the weeds of avarice from our hero's breast, and planted in its the genial bud of benevolence, which began to bloom in all the freshness of spring, and to diffuse around it a reviving odour. Quick came. What was his surprise and joy, upon receiving as a present his master's former apparel. The poor fellow could hardly believe the evidence of his senses: he wept for joy, and manifested his gratitude in a number of antic grimaces, which would have ruffled the composure of a saint. Traffic now set out for church, with a palpitating heart. Upon reaching it, he seated himself in his pew, anxiously awaiting the arrival of his Dulcinea. She soon made her appearance; his heart throbbed with delight; his eye met hers! they tenderly gazed on each other; in a word, their passion became mutual. Divine service being ended, the congregation left the church, and among them the fair Julia, followed by Traffic at a respectful distance. The latter in vain tormented his brain in planning a manœuvre to get an introduction. Fortune however, soon released him from his embarrassment: the sky suddenly became overcast, the clouds thickened, the rain descended in torrents. He thanked his stars, for he was luckily provided with a cane which contained an umbrella; he flew to her, tendered his umbrella, and of course his services. Julia thankfully accepted his offer, and they proceeded on their way. But, reader, to spare your time and my ink and paper, I'll be brief. Our hero, on reaching the house of his mistress, was pressed by her to step in: he was transported with joy at her request. In the twinkling of an eye, he was introduced to her mother, who was a widow of respectable fortune, and one of the cleverest old ladies in existence. She received him with much courtesy, for she knew him to be a merchant of standing, and thought him a good match for her daughter. In fine, Traffic received invitation after invitation. At last he mustered up sufficient boldness to open his heart to his mistress. She heard him with a smile, which bespoke her willingness to gratify his fondest wishes. The match was concluded; and in the short space of three weeks, fast as the priest could make them, they were one. Soon after his marriage, Traffic became renowned, both far and wide for his liberality. Every one witnessed his kindness. The unfortunate never applied to him in vain; nor did the cry of affliction reach his ear, without instant relief being administered. This, gentle reader, is the history of one of the most unfeeling misers that ever lived; and this the wondrous, thrice wondrous change, which the omnipotence of love effected in a heart, which was once steeled against every tender emotion.

C. F. B.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Chronicles of the City of Gotham. By a retired Common Councilman. 12mo. pp. 269. New-York: G. & C. & H. Carvill. 1830.

RIDICULE is a powerful weapon, whether employed against the vices or follies of the day; there is danger, however, in using it against the former, lest matters of serious importance, which should never be trifled with, should be treated so irreverently, as to shock even those who are pleased to see vice whipped of justice, but not to see Justice in the garb of a buffoon.

We have our doubts whether the re-action of a severe jest is not sometimes, like the recoil of a piece of artillery, more injurious to the jester and his cause than to the object of attack, since both jester and cannonier are often imprudent in the quantum of ammunition, and hence produce an explosion. Ridicule, however, when untinctured by malevolence and satire, when not prompted by personal revenge, may be beneficially brought to bear upon the foibles, and even vices of a community; and we know of no writer who more skilfully uses these arms than the author of the "Chronicles of the City of Gotham." We are aware that it will be urged by some that there are no such coteries as the Petticoats, Applebys, and other blue-stocking figurantes that are introduced in these chronicles under the soft name of "the azure hose;" but that there are substantial forms which throw out shadows like these, we are also aware. The grossness of a caricature tends to draw more attention to it; but because it is monstrous, the excellence of it is not the less apparent; as, if one were to ridicule the present grotesque poke bonnet, the surest way to accomplish that object would be to enlarge the dimensions on paper far beyond the real enormities which excite the ridicule. The writer of this work, so far from being inimical to whatever of refinement may be drawn from the literature and manners of foreign nations, is perhaps as sincere an admirer of what is really valuable in the attainments of other nations as any of our writers, and would lament their exclusion from our country as much as he justly and happily satirizes the propensity, but too common amongst us, and unfortunately becoming still more so, to neglect our own productions and indulge in a morbid appetite for every thing exotic, simply because it is so. The volume before us possesses much originality of thought, conveyed in a lively and piquant style. The satire is rather broad, and yet not too much so for the subject, more especially as through it are perceptible the disposition to elevate the minds and improve the hearts of his readers. There is somewhere a dash at the present system of education, but our boarding-school misses should see in it nothing more than a friendly hint that there is something to be learned beyond the exercises of their teen-days, however solid their lessons may be. We give a few extracts, showing the general character of the work. The story of "The Politician" may be read by all ladies ambitious of appearing at the court at Washington, as well as by the aspiring politicians of this Machiavellian age; amusement, and perhaps instruction may be derived from it. "The Dumb Girl" ought to have appeared in the annual report of some public charity, rather than within the boards of an entertaining compend of things to be laughed at ad libitum. But to the extracts.

The following from "the Azure Hose" shows the extent to which the author carries his antipathy to the "bugbear," as he terms the fancied superiority of every thing foreign, merely because it is foreign.

"Were you ever abroad, Mr. Highfield?"

"No, but I intend it one of these days. I wish to go there to undeceive myself, and get rid of those ignoble ideas of the superiority of every thing abroad inculcated by books, and by every thing we see and hear from our youth upwards. 'Tis worth while to go, if for no other purpose than getting rid of this monstrous bugbear."

"What," said they all, with one voice, "you don't believe in the superiority of foreign literature?"

"Not of the present day."

"Nor foreign manners?"

"No, nor morals either."

"Nor of French cookery?" quoth Puddingham.

"Nor of English poetry?" quoth Goshawk.

"Nor of Italian skies?" quoth Miss Overend, enthusiastically.

"Nor of London porter?" exclaimed Mrs. Coates.

"No, no, no, no," replied Highfield, good-humouredly, yet earnestly; "as to your Italian skies, a friend of mine assured me he was three months in Italy and never saw a clear sky. The truth is, we take our ideas of Italian skies from English poets, who, not having an opportunity of seeing the sun at home above once or twice a year, vault into raptures with the delight of sunshine on the continent. Those of our countrymen who judge for themselves have assured me that in no part of Europe have they ever seen such beautiful blue skies, such starry firmaments, and such a pure transparent air, as our summers and autumns present almost every day and every night. And as to their Venus de Medicis, I need not go out of the room to satisfy myself that there is no necessity for a voyage to Europe to meet goddesses that shame all the beauties of antiquity;" and he bowed all round, to the ladies, who each took the compliment herself, and pardoned his numerous heresies on the score of his orthodoxy in one particular.

"I am exactly the height of the Venus de Medicine," said little Mrs. Coates, and forgot the slander on the English skies. "You mean to go to Europe, and visit Almanacks."

"For what, madam? To see a company of well dressed men and women, who look exactly like ourselves, only the ladies are not half so handsome, nor do they dance half so well? No, if I go abroad at all, it will be to learn properly to estimate the happiness of my own country."

The ladies, though they could not get over the silly and vulgar notion of the superiority of society abroad, all thought Highfield a very polite, agreeable young fellow, and Lucia found herself on the very threshold of relishing a little common sense. The party soon after separated, having spent a most improving morning.

In the same vein of satire or affected misanthropy, is the following. The poetical curse is pungent enough to have been produced by Sterne or Southey. The compliment to Miss Sedgwick is fully justified by the talent displayed in the work alluded to, which has since made its appearance under the title of "Clarence."

They found all the azures, except Mr. Goshawk, assembled at one of the drawing room windows, Mrs. Petticoats and all clamorously reading, and clamorously applauding some verses written on a pane of glass, with a diamond pencil. The reader shall not miss them. They ran as follows:

Cursed be the sun—'tis but a heavenly ball!
Cursed be the moon, false woman's planet pale;
Cursed the bright stars, that man's wild fortunes tell;
And cursed the elements! Oh! I could rail
At power, and potentates, and paupers' pelf,
And, most of all, at that vile wretch, myself!

What are the bonds of life, but halsters tied?
What love, but luxury of bitter woe?
What man, but misery personified?
What woman, but an angel fallen below?
What hell but heaven—what heaven but hell above?
What love, but hate—what hate, but curdled love?
What wedlock, but community of ill?
What single blessedness, but double pain?
What life's best sweets, but a vile doctor's pill?
What life itself, but dying o'er again?
And what this earth, the vilest, and the last,
On which the pl. nets all their offuscated?

Oh! doubly cursed—

Here it would seem, the bard stopped to take breath, overcome either by his own exertions, or finding there was nothing left for him to curse.

"I never heard such delightful swearing," cried Miss Appleby.

"What charming curses!" cried Miss Overend.

"What touching misanthropy!" cried Mr. Puddleford.

"What powerful writing!" cried Puddingham.

"What glowing meteors!" cried Mrs. Coates, determined not to mistake meteors for metaphors this time.

Lucia said nothing, but the tumults of her bosom told her nobody could write such heart-rending lines but Mr. Goshawk.

"Don't you think them equal to Lord Byron?" said Miss Appleby to Highfield.

"Very likely, madam, Lord Byron wrote a vast deal of heartless fustian."

"Heartless fustian!" screamed Miss Appleby, and "heartless fustian!" echoed the rest of the azures, with the exception of Lucia, who determined not to commence the watch-chain that evening, if ever.

"Fustian! do you call such poetry fustian? so full of powerful writing, and affording such delicious excitement! For my part, I can't live without excitement of some kind or other," said Miss Overend.

"What kind of excitement do you mean, madam," said Highfield, mischievously, "the Morgan excitement or the Stephenson excitement?"

"Pshaw! Mr. Highfield, you are always ridiculing sentiment. I mean the excitement of powerful writing, powerful feeling, powerful passion, grief, joy, rage, despair, madness, misanthropy, pain, pleasure, anticipation, retrospection, disappointment, hope, and—and—every thing that creates excitement. By the by, they say the author of Redwood is coming out with a new novel. I wonder what it is about."

"I don't know," answered Highfield, "but I will venture to predict it will be all that is becoming in a sensible, well bred, well educated, delicate woman, neither misled by a false taste nor affected sentiment."

"Pooh!" said the great Puddingham, "there is no fire in her works."

"Nor brimstone either," said Highfield.

"Nor murder," said Miss Appleby.

"Nor powerful writing," said Miss Overend.

"Nothing to make the heart burst like a barrel of gunpowder," said little Mrs. Petticoats.

"Perhaps so," replied Highfield, "but a book may be worth something without either fire, murder, or gunpowder in it."

In conclusion, we recommend this entertaining volume to all the readers of the Mirror, not doubting its power to instruct as well as amuse.

Sketches of Public Characters. Drawn from the Living and the Dead. With notices of other matters. By Ignatius Loyola Robertson, LL.D. a resident of the United States. New-York: E. Bliss. 12mo. pp. 259. 1830.

We have only found time to look through this book in a cursory manner. It is evidently from the pen of a practised writer. The style is easy and graceful. The author expresses his opinions of men and things with great freedom, and we believe them to be generally correct. Many no doubt will complain that his list of celebrated men is rather limited, and that several are placed here who have no pretensions to such an honour. We are however aware of the impossibility of comprehending all our "distinguished characters," in so small a volume as the one before us. The writer probably confined himself to those within the compass of his personal observation. The following sketches will afford our readers an opportunity of judging of his manner.

WEBSTER.—The person of Mr. Webster is singular and commanding: his height is above the ordinary size, but he cannot be called tall; he is broad across the chest, and stoutly and firmly built, but there is nothing of clumsiness either in his form or gait. His head is very large, his forehead high, with good shaped temples. He has a large, black, solemn looking eye, that exhibits strength and steadfastness, and which sometimes burns, but seldom sparkles. His hair is of a raven black, and both thick and short, without the mark of a gray hair. His eyebrows are of the same colour, thick and strongly marked, which gives his features the appearance of sternness; but the general expression of his face after it is properly examined, is rather mild and amiable than otherwise. His movements in the house and in the street are slow and dignified; there is no peculiar sweetness in his voice, its tones are rather harsh than musical, still there is a great variety in them; and some of them catch the ear and chain it down to the most perfect attention. He bears traits of great mental labour, but no marks of age; in fact, his person is more imposing now, in his forty-eighth year, than it was at thirty.

EVERETT.—Mr. Everett's eloquence is characterized by taste, sweetness, harmony, delicacy and correctness. It has the Ciceronian flow, ease and purity, and all the great Roman's accuracy and marks of scholarship. He is said to be ambitious, and to dearly love political distinctions. Of this, it is probable, he will soon get cured by the shiftings and changings of party, and in the fulness of his genius, return from the bustle of the hall of legislation to the groves of the academy he deserted. If it should so happen, it will be well; for learning should have more knowledge of the world than it generally has, and the world should have more learning than it is disposed to honour and cherish.

LIVINGSTON.—Edward Livingston of the senate, is a hale, vigorous man, past the grand climacteric. He has been active in professional and political pursuits for more than forty years. He was born in the state of New-York, and by brilliant talents, and family connexions, was early brought into public notice. As a lawyer he was conspicuous and took a high stand, at a very early age, at the bar. In 1793 he was in congress, and took an active part on the questions which arose upon Jay's treaty. He was, of course, in the minority; which is the best school for a young, aspiring politician. He can discuss measures without being responsible for them, and learns the science of attack and defence without danger of injuring his reputation. After being in congress for some years, he was elected mayor of the city of New-York; an office then next, in point of emolument, to that of the president of the United States. It is said that he was a very effective, energetic executive officer; and "that there never was a better judicial magistrate on the bench than Edward Livingston." He was succeeded by De Witt Clinton.

Mr. Livingston is one of the most learned men of his age; for he has been assiduous in acquiring knowledge, and has lost none of his acquisitions by ill health or decay of mental powers. If his style is less copious than it was in his earlier days, it has lost nothing of its vigour or spirit: even his imagination has all the creative powers it had when he first appeared before the public, as his last speech in the senate, on Mr. Foot's resolutions, will fully show.

WIRT.—Mr. Wirt you have heard of as the author of the British Spy and several other works which have been read and admired in this country and in Europe. He is now about sixty years of age, a stout, fair, good looking man. He has been for many years a laborious lawyer, and for several years past Attorney General of the United States, which office he has filled with credit to himself and to the nation. His manners are bland and courteous, particularly, to those who seek him, tinged with a little of that Virginian trait—self-consideration, which gives a dignity to a public man when it does not degenerate into the affectation of high bred fashion without many early advantages. Mr. Wirt, in the midst of the business of an arduous profession, has made himself a fine classical scholar. His imagination is strong and refined. He sees every subject in its true light and paints it with a master's touch; some of his descriptions glow with all the colours of fancy, and are yet most admirably true to nature. Many of his intellectual portraits are of the first order of genius, and some of his narratives are wrought up to a dramatic affect.

RANDOLPH.—I have often seen this most singular man, and often heard him speak. Many of the sketches of his person have been more accurate than those given of his mind. It must be confessed that his person and dress are so unique, that a just representation of them would, to those unacquainted with Mr. Randolph, seem a caricature. He is about six feet in height; perhaps his narrow chest and long legs make him appear a little taller than he is. His head is small, his shoulders high, and all parts of his physiognomy, except his eye, altogether unintellectual. He is beardless, or nearly so, and his muscles and his skin about his face shrivelled, although he is not more than fifty-six years of age. Notwithstanding his height, his frame is so slender that his weight is not more than one hundred and thirty pounds. His long legs support a short body that is "not more than a talon in the waist." His arms are very long and small, and his fingers bird-claw-like, and in debate he makes them very expressive. His hair is dark, thin and lank, and lies close to his head. His movements are rapid and awkward. His voice is shrill and high, and perfectly soprano: latterly his voice has lost most of its power; his throat seems to be dry and husky. This is the effect of disease, for he has long been an invalid; the fine piercing and life-like notes of his voice are nearly extinct. So much for his person. His mind is still more singular than his person. His perceptions are, I speak of him as he has been, quick and his impressions strong; but it is in the strength and elevation of his imagination that he is above most men.

His judgment, from every evidence I have ever seen or heard, is either feeble or never consulted in his acts or speeches. His memory is good, often minutely accurate; but it is now somewhat impaired. His attainments are considerable, rather miscellaneous than political or professional. His knowledge of the English language is critical and extensive, and he is quite fastidious in his choice of words; and one of the best things about him is that he keeps a constant vigil over the good old English, his mother tongue. His acquaintance with English history is minute; and it may be said of him that he is well read in general history; but saving and excepting the annals of his own state he knows not much of American history. His classical knowledge has been overrated. In the common Latin classics he is quite at home, and quotes with great readiness, but his acquaintance with those less read in this country must be limited, for in his passion for display he never mentions them.

BERRIEN.—The present Attorney General John McPherson Berrien is from Georgia, but I understand that he is a native of Philadelphia. He is a most eloquent speaker. In the senate he was a model for chaste, free, beautiful elocution. He seemed to be the only man that Webster softened his voice to, when he turned from his seat to address him. There is not the slightest dash in his manner; it is as grave as it is pleasant. His views are clear, and he meets the subject manfully. In his arguments there is no demagogical praises of his constituents, no tirade of abuse against his opponents, or of the section of country from whence they came. He is said to have been a good judge on the bench, and an excellent lawyer at the bar, and surely he was a host for his party in the senate. He is now an Attorney General, and a cabinet counsellor as well as counsel for the cabinet. The public of all parties have great confidence in him, and he stands fair for higher promotion.

From the preceding specimens the reader will readily perceive that "Sketches of Public Characters" is a work of more than ordinary interest.

We had selected several other portions of this excellent volume for the present impression of the Mirror, but they have been necessarily excluded for want of room. We shall recur to it again.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

THE RAMBLER.—NUMBER TWENTY-THREE.

MADNESS.

"All men think all men crazy, but themselves."

THERE is a fine instance of madness in Henry Mackenzie's "Man of Feeling." During Harley's visit to Bedlam, he was accosted by a very civil gentleman who accompanied him to the different cells of the maniacs, with many shrewd and compassionate observations touching those unhappy persons. Much wisdom passed between them, and their mutual admiration was rapidly rising to esteem; when Harley happened to quote Pope's line—

"From Macedonia's madman to the Swede," his companion replied—"It was indeed a very mad thing in Charles to think of adding so vast a country as Russia to his dominions: the balance of the north would then have been lost; but the sultan and I would never have allowed it."

"Sir," said Harley.

"Why yes," answered the other, "do you not know me? I am the khan of Tartary!"

It has been contended that madness is not quite so rare a misfortune as is generally supposed, but that every mind, at some time or other, takes a tinge of the visionary disease, which circumstances may either conceal or deepen into the confirmed shades of delirium. It is true, we are not all so far gone as to suppose ourselves the "khan of Tartary." We do not, like poor Tom, follow the foul fiend "through fire and through flame, through ford and whirlpool, over bog and quagmire;" nor "ride on a bay-trotting horse over four-inch bridges," but very exaggerated opinions of our own excellence—and inaccurate calculations of what we will do and what we have done, are by no means uncommon. It is incredible what a quantity of this partial insanity there is floating about the globe. You will find people sensible and shrewd on every point but one, whose last will and testament would stand good in any court of law, and yet who are incurably crazy upon that one point. Indeed, it is so impossible to meet with a man sane on all subjects, that I for one, verily believe that nature has left a flaw in the brain of every human being, of which he is unconscious, but which is palpably visible to all the world besides. In men of imaginative minds and acute feelings, this flaw amounts to temporary insanity; while in hum-drum, stagnant, every-day people, it is merely productive of what is termed "hobbies" or "queer notions," which is no less than saying and doing things which all except themselves regard as the essence of absurdity. And the most wonderful thing is the perfect complacency with which A points out to B the flaw in C's understanding, who, as B observes is otherwise a sensible man, while all the time A wonders how B can be quick-sighted enough to perceive the deficiencies of poor C, and yet be guilty of such unheard of follies himself, and marvels and ponders very wisely on the incongruities of human nature, at the same time that his own crack is of astonishing dimensions. The world is one large Bedlam, where, as long as the antic tricks of its patients harm no one but themselves, they are quietly allowed by their brother madmen to play off their ridiculous pranks; and the reader may depend that both himself and his intimate friends have large fissures in their skulls out of which folly of a most astounding character occasionally finds vent for the amusement of the good-natured world. No person is exempt; and the only way is for a man to give up the notion of his infallibility, and set seriously about discovering and then concealing as far as possible his own especial infirmity, for he may rest assured that he has his fits of temporary insanity like his neighbours. The writer of this has devoted much time and attention to his own case, and has at last come to the conclusion that he is sane on a considerable number of subjects, but that horse-racing is not one of them. He is learned, or thinks himself so, in "Turf Registers," "Racing Calendars," &c. and is apt to indulge in long and interminable harangues on this branch of literature, with very little regard to either person, place, time, or circumstances; and he was first brought to a sense of his situation by observing an involuntary shudder in his friends and acquaintances whenever the subject was remotely alluded to.

In this city, at the present time, there are numerous infidel, education, and agrarian cracks in the heads of the citizens of the upper wards, which will doubtless enlarge considerably before and during the fall elections; and it behoves some of the leaders to take care that their insanity does not arise to a height which will warrant their being brought within the compass of a straight waistcoat. For my part, I think the crack political, or government and world-reforming crack, is the most desperate and disagreeable that any man can possibly have in his understanding, and at once qualifies him for an immeasurable bore. In fact, the political madman is neither more nor less than a downright nuisance. He gives up the character of an honest, reputable man, forsakes his decent employments, and becomes a selfish, lying, bullying, speech-making, canvassing animal, who haunts porter-houses and oyster-cellars, to circulate the most flimsy opinions for the vilest purposes. He goes early to ward-meetings, and perchance gets appointed secretary or put on a committee, which he looks upon as one step towards a seat in the legislature or perchance the senate. Shades of the fathers of the eternal city, only think of that! Mr. — the little corpulent, red-visaged, brandy-bibbing cordwainer, a senator! Well, such a creature straightway becomes infected with conceit, ignorance, impudence, and a vast variety of other moral filth—makes himself familiar with all the little dirty occurrences, and paltry distinctions which have taken place in the ward for the last ten years; and when this valuable knowledge is put in fermentation by his usual quantity of beer, he discourses sagely and gravely of "broad and general principles"—pawns his soul for Alderman So-and-so, and then talks about measures not men! In company, at the tea-table, or in the drawing-room, he brings his porter-house talk along with him, and either bolts out boldly with a warm assertion which kindles some kindred spirit, who with him monopolizes all the conversation, or else lies in wait ready to entangle his unsuspecting victim in a political dispute. And all the time this poor creature imagines that he is discharging his duty to his country, and actually doing "the state some service," while, at the best, he is a mean tool in the hands of some juggler behind the curtain, and bears the odium of base occupation without its reward.

Then there are literary, and theatrical, and uniform-company madmen; in fact, there is no end to the strange vagaries of the insane ladies and gentlemen who dwell upon the face of the earth; and it behoves every descendant of Adam to turn his or her attention to the condition of their craniums, and if they cannot cure, to at least endeavour to conceal their infirmities from the sneers and laughter of the world. C.

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

NEW SERIES.—NUMBER XVI.

THERE is no pleasanter hour than the middle of a clear still summer night. The morning may steal over the world with its brilliant changes—meadows, rivers, and "skiey mountains" may sleep beneath the blue of noon—the setting sun may cover earth and heaven with rosy light, and make common objects beautiful; and the soft shadow of evening may fall like a mantle over the vanished day, yet in the middle night there is something deeper, calmer, more silent, lonely, and fascinating.

I had spent hours in a gay assemblage of belles and beaux. There had been a crowd to whom existence was all joy. The noisy merriment of fashion rung in my ears, and its bright confusion floated in my imagination. The sound of dancing feet and unrestrained laughter mingled with the lively music, and voices which rose as if they leaped from pure and happy hearts, came back pleasantly to my memory.

It was all over now, and I rambled forth through the solitary meadows with the fire-flies flashing around. I paused to contemplate the loveliness of the night.

I looked back upon the stately mansion so lately illumined, and echoing to the sounds of mirth. The merry throng were dispersed. Deep silence rested upon it: a shadow, flung from the luxuriant branches of several fine elms on the lawn, allowed only a part to be visible, with the moonlight sleeping upon its white walls and tall columns, and the greville rose clustering up around the piazza, to which some careful hand had added sweetbriar and honeysuckle. It seemed like woman's taste. Strange, I thought, this change of time and circumstance—this perpetual passing away of human scenes—these striking sudden contrasts in life; and all coming towards us and flowing by, and losing themselves in the dim distance on the lapsing tide which men call time. The dreamy past—the distinct beautiful present—the vague future—all in motion onward and onward, while we also as we muse and moralize, suffer and enjoy, are ourselves borne along by its mysterious irresistible influence. In the giddy dance, with the motley crowd—compelled to participate in the trifling circumstances which occur around, these vain reflections are excluded from the mind; but in the wide unbroken stillness of the night—where nothing moves but the leaves, and the interminable arch of golden worlds above, and they for ever in silent order—the heart unfolds itself undisturbed—the mighty mind is unchained, and stretches itself out in idle reverie.

And this it is to be alone with nature. When the thousands who have been shuffling all day over its dusty surface, have sunk from their various labours into "the death of each day's life." I paused again and listened,

"The winds were whist, and the owl was still,
And the bat in his shelly rock was hid;
And naught was heard from the lonely hill,
But the cricket's chirp and the answer shrill
Of the gauze-wing'd catydid."

Every thing was hushed as if the aspiring race of man had been all swept away, and I left sole tenant of the globe.

Happy the man who at such a time can review his frail existence without remorse. To what purpose has he been sent upon this beautiful earth? Whom has he loved? Who has loved him? How many of these have gone down into the grave? How many are yet among the living, separated perchance in person by the sea—or near in daily communion, yet separated by barriers broader than oceans? As these pensive thoughts forced themselves upon me, I recalled to my recollection the lively festivity in which the commencement of the evening had been spent, and which contrasted singularly with the solitude and silence in which I was now brooding over melancholy reflections. Happy beings, I thought, no gloomy fancies have darkened your minds. May no painful dreams haunt your pillows. For ever may your paths be among pleasant places. For ever be your laugh as light and your hearts as careless as they have been to-night.

"Rather desire," said the voice of the Genius, "that thou, master student, mayest learn to look with more discerning observation. Light laughter and careless hearts, sayest thou? Thou hast seen glowing faces and moving forms, but the brightness of their appearance has deceived thee. Every where disappointment exists, and among the graceful group of girls whose bosoms thou hast deemed untouched by care, have been pangs deeper perhaps than thou hast ever imagined."

The mirror rose gradually before me. I seemed transported back to the circle of pleasure—the same gay, glowing, lovely girls were there.

"You spoke," said I, "of pain. Surely it is excluded from this bright apartment."

"To a slight observer," replied the Genius, "society often seems like the smooth surface of the summer sea. He knows not the rugged rocks, the gloomy caverns, the uncouth monsters which lurk beneath. I will show you a history. Have you remarked yonder maiden in conversation with that aged man?"

"I believe!" answered I, "I saw her in the evening. But her dress is so simple and her appearance so plain, that I neither sought her company nor regarded her actions."

"And which more particularly attracted your attention?"

"Can you doubt," said I, "that the sunny face and light form by her side should have proved more charming? I could gaze on those features forever. Every motion is graceful—the tones of her voice are full of sweetness—the arch and varying smile which lurks about her 'rosebud lips,' might touch the bosom of an evil spirit, with a feeling of tenderness; and her eyes—"

"And suppose," asked my companion, "I should give you the command of wealth and rank, and control over her affections, would you take her to your bosom as your companion through the world?"

"I should deem myself a blessed man to possess such an angel."

"Let me," said the Genius, "break the mere spell of beauty, and allow you to behold her real character, mind, and thoughts."

I started with surprise. The beaming lustre of her glances changed to a vacant stare. An unmeaning simper parted her mouth to exhibit the whiteness of her teeth. Sometimes she gazed down in admiration of her feet, and sometimes extended her hand to display the rings upon her fingers. "I am certainly," she thought, "the prettiest girl in the room. How well my flounce looks! With what taste I have arranged my hair! How much better I dance than any of the others! I wish some one would fall in love with me! I should so like to get married. It would be a triumph over the rest of the girls, and I declare there comes a handsome fellow! If he could only see me dance!"

"Now look at her whom you deemed unworthy of notice," said the Genius.

She still conversed with her companion. But her plain features were lighted with an expression so intelligent and lively, that I wondered how I had neglected her. I listened to her remarks, which came from a cultivated, and perhaps lofty mind, and an affectionate disposition. Yet I could perceive through this assumed cheerfulness of manner, that her heart was agitated. Sometimes a smile of hope and expectation half parted her lips; then again, they settled into sadness, and with a strong and painful effort she checked the tears which would have struggled up into her eyes. It was evident from her hurried and cautious glances toward a youth near her, that she was cherishing an unrequited attachment in secret, against her wish—her pride—her hope.

"Yes," said the Genius, "she loves, and hers is not the transient excitement of vanity, nor the mere impulse of a romantic or capricious feeling. But accident has flung her in the way of one blessed with all the noble qualities of manhood. Wealthy, talented, destined to tread a high career, and worthy of the world's applause. She loves him for his intellect and disposition. See his commanding form moving among the nameless fops around. Is not that a face upon which woman's eyes may rest with pleasure—which her heart may cherish, and almost worship with inward devotion?"

"And yet," said I, "he regards her not."

"No," said the Genius, "she is poor and lonely, timid and shrinking from observation. I will bring back the enchantment of beauty to yonder silly and bad hearted girl, and you may mark how easily the highest of earth may be ensnared."

Again, the conscious maiden appeared in all her charms—her beautiful mouth half disclosed the smile of opening love—a modest blush overspread her cheeks, and she cast down her brilliant eyes beneath the gaze of rapture with which the youth regarded her.

As I turned with pity towards her whose faithful heart was thus afflicted with the acutest disappointment which a generous woman can suffer, she was no longer to be seen; and then, the whole vision vanished, and I was again standing alone in the hush of midnight, inhaling the sweet breath of the dewy fields and flowers, undisturbed but by the gleaming of the night-loving fire-flies which flashed among the bushes.

His father, Aaron Kean, was a mechanic, in the humblest walks of life. His mother is only known as a daughter of the celebrated George Saville Carey. Several of his relations followed the profession of the stage for a support, and the poverty of Kean's parents induced them to place their son at Drury-Lane theatre in the lower departments of pantomime as soon as he was able to walk. Here he was placed under a famous posture-master till his limbs became capable of winding themselves into the strangest contortions, and his body had acquired the greatest flexibility.

In this situation he remained until he attained his tenth year. His talents as a boy are highly spoken of, and he was generally looked upon by the actors as a youth of superior understanding and great promise. A dispute with John Kemble, the then manager of Drury-Lane theatre, occasioned the dismissal of our young hero from that establishment, and he was immediately placed at school. Stated tasks and regulated hours soon became irksome, and he shortly succeeded in stealing away from home, and entering as cabin-boy on board a ship bound to Madeira. This new profession did not agree with his utter abhorrence of all restraint, and upon the expiration of his first voyage, we find him again returning to the fascinations of a theatrical life. Through the interest of his relatives he obtained an engagement with a troupe of itinerant actors, who frequent the fairs held annually in London and its vicinity. He continued in this company about seven years, during which time he experienced the almost maternal protection of Miss Tidswell, an actress attached to Drury-Lane theatre—his mother, having taken to the stage, was absent from London, being engaged at some of the provincial theatres. The talent he exhibited in recitations, and the peculiar turn for mimicking which he possessed, induced Miss Tidswell to advise him to turn his attention to the regular drama, a suggestion that he eagerly embraced. He applied himself with diligence to the study of Shakespeare and other eminent dramatists, and soon acquired an extensive knowledge of their unrivalled excellence. His protectress also recommended him to the manager of a provincial theatre, where his success was at once decided. In the course of his peregrinations with this company he attracted the notice of royalty at Windsor by his admirable recitations of "Satan's address to the sun," and the first soliloquy of Richard III.; he was also fortunate enough to engage the attention of Dr. Drury, one of the masters of Eton school, who in consequence (it is said) placed him in that institution, where he remained three years. In this short time he is said to have become thoroughly acquainted with Virgil, Cicero, and Sallust—a statement that is scarcely credible. At the end of this period he returned to his theatrical occupations, under his old name of Carey, and obtained an engagement at Birmingham, where he played with success, but not with that warmth of approbation which attended his earlier efforts. At Edinburgh, where he next appeared, he performed Hamlet twelve successive nights to crowded houses. From this time until his engagement at Drury-lane in 1814, he passed through the usual routine of a stroller's life, alternately raised to the highest pitch of provincial excellence, or exposed to the hardships and privations necessarily attendant on his itinerant labours. He had, however, acquired a celebrity during these country engagements which had attracted the attention of several individuals connected with the London houses. It was to the friendship of Dr. Drury that he was at length indebted for his introduction to the metropolis. That gentleman had been a warm admirer of the growing genius of Kean from a very early period, and was not unobtrusively of the progress it was making to perfection. He had seen him perform at Exeter, in 1813, and was so impressed with his talents that he wrote to Pascoe Grenfell, the member of parliament, one of the committee of management of Drury-Lane theatre, upon the subject, stating it as his opinion, that Kean was the only man able to sustain the declining fortunes of that house. Mr. Grenfell immediately consulted with Mr. Whitbread and other members of the committee, and the result was, that Mr. Arnold, the stage manager, was dispatched to Dorchester, where Kean was then performing, to report on Dr. Drury's communication. Mr. Arnold saw him in Octavian, and afterwards in Kanko in La Perouse, and was at once satisfied of the correctness of Dr. Drury's judgment. He invited the actor to breakfast the next morning, and (although not expressly authorized by the committee) concluded an engagement with him for three years, at eight, ten, and twelve guineas per week, for each successive year. On his arrival in London, he waited on Mr. Arnold, and was by him introduced to the committee, who, it is reported, were induced by his appearance to judge so humbly of his probable powers as to lecture Mr. Arnold severely for the additional and useless expense with which he had rashly burdened the theatre. Still the agreement was signed and could not be violated; of course, therefore, he had a claim upon the treasury, which, indeed, was admitted; but on the second Saturday, to his great surprise, it was rejected upon the ground that he had been previously engaged at the Surrey theatre by Mr. Elliston. The facts of the case were, that Elliston had been in treaty for him and spoke of the probability of giving him two pounds per week to do every thing, but wished a little time for deliberation before completing so extensive an engagement. Mr. Arnold had stepped in during this period of hesitation, and the result was, Kean became a member of the great metropolitan theatre. These facts were sufficiently proved, and through the active intercession of Dr. Drury, Kean was retained by the committee and advertised for the part of Shylock, in which character he made his appearance before a London audience on the twenty-sixth of January 1814. One of the first critics, speaking of this event, says, "the dreary appearance of the house, and the unknown character of the performer, made me feel considerable apprehension for his success, but from the first scene in which Mr. Kean came on, my doubts were at an end. I had been told to give as favourable an account as I could—I gave a true one. I am not one of those who when they see the sun breaking from behind a cloud, stop to ask others whether it is the moon."

This opinion was quickly echoed by the play-going populace of London. The writer of this article witnessed an early representation of his Shylock, and nothing could exceed the enthusiastic and tumultuous applause which increased with every scene, until the theatre became one scene of deafening uproar. His performance of Richard III. the twelfth of February following, completed his success; and it was admitted, that he might safely challenge competition with the most distinguished ornaments of the British stage.

It would be useless to follow him through the successive characters he afterwards personated—nor would it be interesting to describe the peculiarities of excellence he exhibited in each, most readers have probably witnessed their representations, and have decided upon their relative merits. It is sufficient to say, that in each character he exhibited new claims to public admiration, which had now reached its height. His acquaintance was courted by the rich and talented, presents were lavished on him in abundance, and the profits arising from his professional labours rose in the same extensive proportion.

His brother actors belonging to Drury-Lane theatre, presented him with a gold cross, as a compliment to his unrivalled talents; and the subscription list for that purpose, was headed by the most illustrious members of the committee of management of that house, foremost among whom stood the name of Byron. A number of gentlemen residing in Edinburgh, bestowed on him a magnificent sword, which was accompanied by a highly interesting and complimentary letter from the venerable Sir John Sinclair. During a short trip he made to Paris, he received from the celebrated Talma, the most flattering marks of attention, and by the managers of the Theatre Français, he was presented with a superb gold snuff box. These numerous honours are cited to prove the estimation in which his talents were held by all classes of society, and to show that he might have attained in private life, the same distinctions which marked his public career, but unfortunately such was not the case. Impatient of control, and regardless of many of the conventional rules of refined society, Kean chose rather to move in circles where he could rule undisturbed, the first of his associates. It may be supposed that these circumstances, added to the extraordinary success which attended him, procured him numerous enemies and detractors.

It is not our purpose to trace him through his subsequent career. His first visit to this country, his disputes with the Boston audience, his return to England, his disgraceful conduct there, and his subsequent appearance in America, are facts familiar to almost every one. Since his last return to his native country, report speaks of his powers having suffered a visible decay. He is however one of the candidates for the lease of Drury-Lane theatre, owing to the secession of the late spirited manager of that establishment, Mr. Price. Should he embark in this hazardous undertaking, he may be roused to a full sense of its importance, and again become what he certainly might be, the pride and ornament of the British stage.

We cannot close our brief notice of this talented actor, without referring to the equally fortunate and gifted individual, (Forrest,) who with the same rapid strides as Kean effected, has grasped the tragic crown in this country; whose genius

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

PORTRAITS OF CELEBRATED CHARACTERS.

KEAN.

IN the design we have adopted of giving to our readers a series of sketches of the most eminent and literary characters of the present age, we cannot refuse a place to the individual who forms the subject of this notice, although eulogium and invective have alike exhausted their powers in blazoning forth his follies, or in claiming for him the proud titles of "the legitimate successor of Garrick," and "the only true representative of Shakspeare's heroes."

The career of this celebrated actor was, for a long time, one of dazzling brilliancy, unprecedented, perhaps, in the annals of dramatic history, except in the person of his great predecessor, Garrick. His first appearance at Drury-Lane theatre in 1814, has been compared "to the first gleam of genius breaking athwart the gloom of the stage," and certainly, when we take into consideration the declining state of histrionic talent at that period, and the still greater desolation which hovered over Drury-Lane at the time of his fortunate appearance at that house, the full force of the expression will be acknowledged and its justness allowed. Mrs. Siddons had retired, Cooke was dead, and John Kemble had "fallen into the sear and yellow leaf," while "old Drury," as if partaking in the general decline of the drama's ancient glory, presented nightly a "most beggarly account of empty boxes."

It must be obvious that a more favourable opportunity could not have presented itself for the debut of an actor of real talent in the British metropolis. It was the good fortune of Kean to appear at this period, and by the originality of his acting, and the splendour of his genius, to seize at once on the public mind—to stamp himself immediately as the first actor of his day—draw crowded audiences to witness his performances, and retrieve the "fallen fortunes" of the house to which he was attached.

It would be a pleasing task to the biographers of Kean, were his subsequent career, in private life, equally worthy of admiration as are the details of the early progress of his public one; but there are "spots on the sun;" and although some redeeming points in his character are sufficient perhaps to balance many of his defects, yet it is to be regretted that he should have tarnished his fame by acts that are censurable by a strict code of morals, and which in their effects have somewhat detracted from the acknowledged genius he possesses.

Edmund Kean was born in London November 4, 1787.

is alike the subject of pride to his countrymen, as it is the admiration of all intelligent foreigners. Let him pursue his steady and progressive course of improvement, avoiding the rocks and quicksands which wrecked the powerful talents of a Cooke, and has nearly engulfed a Kean, and he will add dignity to the profession of which he is now one of the most distinguished ornaments. H.*

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE PAD-GAUD.

THE writer of this lately passed a very pleasant day near Pensacola at a fête champêtre, given in pursuance of an ancient usage. For more than a week he heard much of the pad-gaud, but not being able to obtain a distinct explanation of the custom, he resolved to satisfy his curiosity in person. He could only learn that it resembled the annual diversion of shooting the jay, as described by Sir Walter Scott in "Old Mortality." He was also informed, that on this occasion the fête was given by three kings, who had at different periods obtained this privilege, by shooting down the bird. The custom was perhaps brought from Normandy to Canada, whence it travelled to Illinois, to Mobile and to this place. It seems to have been in danger of falling into desuetude, during the last three years—the public, however, at length insisted upon its rights—called upon their majesties Judge P. Alderman P. and Colonel G. to pay their debt, in a manner that could not be resisted, and accordingly these "Three kings out o' the west"

resolved to unite, and render the day more than usually brilliant, by way of making amends for their neglect. The day fixed upon was last Saturday, which fortunately turned out to be unusually fine, a circumstance which does not always favour such rural festivals—a general ducking, sometimes terminating those delightful assemblages in the open air. Every sort of vehicle was put in requisition—stages, carriages, gigs, and horse-carts; cavaliers on horse-back, and some on foot; crowds of children, and a dusky posse of plebeians, might be seen in motion at an early hour. By ten o'clock, the streets of Pensacola were entirely deserted—there was scarcely a dog left to keep watch.

The place chosen for the amusements of the day was at the distance of a mile and a half from town, on the high land to the north, where there is a beautiful grove of spreading live oaks. On reaching this spot, rendered more agreeable by contrast with the loose sandy road through which he had to wade, the writer found a numerous assemblage of people, dressed in their holiday apparel, together with all the fashion of the town. A long table was spread under the deep shade of the trees, and near each end of it stood a wide side-board fixed against their large trunks, and well supplied with refreshments. Beyond the grove there was a "bosky dell," filled with the rich, various, and fragrant shrubbery of this climate, and around there was the close green sod of the open fields, which had formerly been cultivated. Not far off stood the untenanted dwelling, at this moment, however, filled to overflowing with the gayest of the gay. The dance had already commenced, several sets of cotillions were footing it at once to the sound of the violin, and attracted by this animating scene, he left those who were seated or moving about singly, or in groups, through the grove, to join the merry throng. The assemblage of beauty would have made a paradise of any place. Pleasure was painted on every countenance. The writer promised himself a delightful time, in which he was not disappointed.

At twelve o'clock, the important business of the day was announced—the shooting of the pad-gaud. Here it is proper to be a little more minute. The body of the bird was somewhat larger than that of a domestic fowl; it was made of the root of cypress or wild olive, or other spongy material, so that it might be struck by a hundred balls without being brought down. An iron rod was passed through it, which was driven into the end of a long pole. The distance from the place where the shooters took their stand, was about seventy yards. The head of the gaudy bird was crowned with a bunch of artificial flowers, while its spreading wings, and the sweepy curve of its tail, were adorned with one hundred ribands of every colour, and fluttering in the breeze—girts which it had obtained from the ladies during the week, while paraded through the town. Every eye was now fixed on this object—it was sufficiently near to enable each fair maiden to distinguish her gift from the rest—and many a generous cavaliero guided by instinct, perhaps by some secret intimation, panted to possess himself, if not of the whole bird, at least of the farow of his damsel. Eighty tickets were drawn from a hat, and the lists forthwith opened. Rifles, muskets, fowling pieces, double or single barrelled, with common or percussion locks, were brought forth. Officers of the army and navy, citizens, the young and old; all engaged in the contest with equal earnestness, and with equal gaiety and good humour;—but the imagination must supply the rest. The shooting continued one hour and a half, until nothing remained of the poor bird but a small piece not longer than one's hand. As it diminished in size, and the aspirants grew more eager, the distance was shortened, until at last each one was at liberty to take what station he pleased. By this time the ornaments of the pad-gaud were transferred to the hats and button holes of the more fortunate marksmen, who seldom obtained the riband most valued by them. A lucky, or perhaps well directed shot, brought down the remaining fragment—a shout ensued, and Mr. V. was proclaimed king. Then followed a procession—his majesty elect with the bouquet in his hand, supported by the ex-kings, and preceded by music, playing "hail to the chief." The procession passed twice in review before the ladies, who were seated, but on coming round the third time, a fair lady was chosen queen of the next festival, the bouquet was presented to her, the choice was ratified by general acclaim, and by the blushes of the maiden.

The company soon after sat down to an elegant dinner—after which the dancing was resumed; the sandango following close on the heels of the Scotch reel. About sundown the returning population once more filled the streets, like the coming in of the tide. Any where else, it might have been worth while to add, that in the whole of this numerous collection, there was not to be seen a single instance of excess, nor was there the slightest occurrence to disturb the harmony and good humour—but here, the circumstance produced no remark. This may be ascribed to the habitual temperance of the Spanish population, and still more to the formidable influence produced by the presence of the fair. It was indeed a pleasant day—and if there should be another pad-gaud,* while the writer remains here, he is determined to be one of the party, perhaps an aspirant for the honours of the day.

Pensacola Gazette.

THE GOVERNMENT OF THE TONGUE.

A very important branch of self-command is the government of the tongue. If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man. This will not appear an extravagant assertion when we consider how numerous are the vices in which this little member takes an active part; that it is this which wears us with garrulity, defames us with calumny, deceives us with falsehood—and that, but for this, we should be no more offended at obscenity, shocked with oaths, or overpowered with scandalous abuse. Well might the apostle write, "If any man among you seem to be religious, and brideth not his tongue, that man's religion is vain."

If we consider these vices of the tongue in the order of their enormity, we shall see how easily one generates another. Talkativeness, the venial offspring of a lively, not to say an unrestrained fancy, hardly rises to a fault, till it is found that he who talks incessantly must often talk foolishly, and that the prattle of a vain and itching tongue degenerates rapidly into that foolish talking and jesting which, as an apostle says, are not convenient. Loquacity is forward and assuming, and soon becomes tiresome. The story, a thousand times told, loses, at last, its humour; and a jest, a thousand times repeated, is despoiled of its point, and palls upon the ear. Something must then be found to revive flagging attention, and what so universally interesting as slander? The faults of our neighbour are then dressed up in all the charms of exaggeration, and the interest of a description is found to be amazingly heightened by a stroke of ridicule, or a tinge of sarcasm. In a listening audience, at every new calumny passed upon another's reputation, some one is found whose fancied credit revives and rises on its ruins in all the lustre of comparison. The tongue then riots in its new privilege, till at length, "at every word a reputation dies."

All this may be done without deliberate malignity, and without violation of truth; because, to speak evil of most men, it is not necessary to speak falsehood; and to pour contempt upon another, it is not necessary to hate or abhor him. Remember, then, that the tongue must be sometimes restrained, even in uttering truth. To justify a froward mouth by a zeal for truth, is commonly to assign, as a previous motive, what occurred only as an after apology. As we may flatter by an unseasonable and lavish expression of merited approbation, so we may calumniate by an incautious and unrestrained disclosure of real defects. A word spoken in due season, how good is it! but remember that death and life are in the power of the tongue, and the tongue of the wise only useth knowledge aright.

* Gaud is an obsolete French word—signifying a male bird—gaud is a male turkey—pad, or pap, from papier, a paper bird. The word gaudy is perhaps derived from the word gaud—the male bird is almost universally more ornamented by brilliant plumage than the female.

Thus far the unguarded talker, we observe, may have proceeded without misrepresentation, and without mischievous intention; but he whose vanity has long been flattered by the attention of an audience, will not easily relinquish the importance he has acquired in particular circles, or see, without uneasiness, that interest decline which his company has been accustomed to excite. Hence, as the stock of scandalous truths is exhausted, fiction lends her aid; and he who was before only a prater, a jester, or a tattler, degenerates into a liar, who entertains by falsehood, and a calumniator, who lives by abuse; and instances are not unfrequent of men whose moral sense, by a process similar to this, has become so entirely obscured or corrupted, that they will utter falsehoods with the most unconscious rapidity and the most unreflecting indifference. Such are the habits which follow, in alarming progression, from an unrestrained indulgence of the tongue. Is not the danger formidable enough to induce us to say, "I am purposed that my mouth shall not transgress: I will take heed to my ways, that I sin not with my tongue."

The catalogue of sins is not completed. Impurity and profaneness are not far behind. The first, indeed, bespeaks such grossness of vice, and the latter such thoughtless impiety that we presume it is almost superfluous to denounce them in this state of society. If for every idle, unprofitable, false, or calumniating word which men shall speak, they shall give an account in the day of judgment, what account shall those men render whose conversation first polluted the pure ear of childhood, first soiled the chastity and whiteness of the young imagination, whose habitual oath first taught the child to pronounce the name of God without reverence, or to imprecate curses on his mates with all the thoughtlessness of youth, but with all the passion and boldness of manhood?

Who, then, is a wise man and endued with knowledge? Let him show, out of a good conversation, his words with meekness of wisdom; for by thy words shalt thou be justified, and by thy words shalt thou be condemned. Rev. Mr. Buckminster.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

THE SUN THE SOURCE OF HEAT.—To be assured of this, it is only necessary to think of the comparative temperatures of night and day, of climates and seasons, and to reflect that the sun is the sole cause of the difference. We need not wonder then, that to many savage nations, seeking the source of their life and happiness, the sun has been the object, not only of admiration, but of worship. The heat comes from the sun with his light. If a sun-beam enter by a small opening in an apartment otherwise close and dark, it illuminates intensely the spot or object on which it falls, and its light being then scattered around, all the objects in the room become feebly visible. Again, a cold thermometer, held to receive the direct ray, rises much, while in any other situation it is less affected, proving the heat to be like the light, widely diffused, and so to lose proportionately of intensity. Light passes from the sun to the earth in about eight minutes of time, and there is every reason to conclude that heat travels at the same rate. Human art can gather the sun-beams together, and by the intense heat produced in the focus of their meeting, produces another proof that the sun is the great source of heat. A pane of glass in a window, or a small mirror, will reflect the sun's ray so as to offend an eye receiving it at a distance of miles, as may be observed soon after the rising, or before the setting of the sun, when his ray is nearly horizontal, and the heat accompanies the ray, for by many such mirrors directed towards one point a combustible object placed there would be inflamed. Archimides set fire to the Roman ships by sun-beams, returned from many points to one; his godlike genius thus rivaling, by natural means, the supposed feats of fabled Jupiter with his thunderbolts. Again, when the light of a broad sun-beam is made by a convex glass or lens to converge to one point or focus, the concentrated heat is also there; for a piece of metal held in the focus drops like melting wax; and if the glass be purposely moved, its focus will pierce through the most obdurate substances, as red hot wire pierces through paper or wood. A hunter on his hill, and travelling hordes on the plains, often conveniently light their fires at the sun himself, by directing his energies through a burning-glass. The direct ray of the sun, simply received into a box, which is covered with glass to exclude the cold air, and is lined with charcoal or burned cork to absorb heat, and to prevent the escape of heat once received, will raise a thermometer in the box to the temperature of two hundred and thirty of Fahrenheit, a temperature considerably above that of boiling water; and the experiment succeeds in any part of the earth where there is a clear atmosphere, and where the sun attains considerable apparent altitude. Reflecting on such facts as now recorded, and on the globular form and the motions of our earth, we have a measure of the differences of climate and of season that should be found upon it. It is evident that the part of the globe turned directly to the sun, receives his rays as abundantly as if it were a perfect plain, similarly facing him, while on parts, which, as viewed from the sun, would be called the sides of the globe, with the increasing obliquity of aspect, an equal breadth or quantity of rays is spread over a larger and a larger surface; and at the very edge the light passes level with the surface, and altogether without touching. The sunny side of many a steep hill in England receives the sun's rays in summer as perpendicularly as the plains about the equator, and such hill-side is not heated like these plains, only because the air over it is colder, just as mountain tops, even at the equator, owing to the rarified, and therefore, cold air around them, remain for ever hooded in snow. In England, at the time of the equinoxes, a level plain receives only half as much of the sun's light and heat as an equal extent of level surface near the equator, and in the short days of winter it receives considerably less than a third of its summer allowance. With respect to the sun as a source of heat, there have been two opinions among philosophers; one class believing that the sun is an intensely heated mass, which radiates its heat and light around, like a mass of intensely heated iron; and another class holding that heat is merely an affection, or state of an ethereal fluid, which occupies all space, as sound is an affection or motion of air, and that the sun may produce the phenomena of light and heat without waste of its temperature or substance, as a bell may without waste continue to produce sound; holding further, that the sun, below its luminous atmosphere, may be habitable even by such as live on this earth. Those who take the first view, are awakened to the dread contemplation of a universe carrying in itself, if its laws remain constant, the seeds of its certain decay, or, at least, of great periodical revolutions; the others may view the universe as destined to last nearly unchanged, until a new act of the will of its Creator shall again alter or destroy it.

INTERESTING PHENOMENON.—The inhabitants of Crassini-Ougol, in the government of Raisen, in Russia, have recently witnessed an interesting phenomenon. At two o'clock in the afternoon, a peal of thunder was heard, without any flash of lightning having been seen, and whilst the sky was perfectly serene. At the same time, and for several minutes, a shower of stones fell: of these stones one has been sent to the Academy of Sciences at Petersburg.

IMPROVED SYSTEM OF BORING WELLS.—The king of the Netherlands has just granted to an inhabitant of Brussels, a patent for a system of boring wells to a great depth, such as two or three hundred feet. This system is said to be more simple, more expeditious, and consequently less expensive, than that on which the Art-sian wells are conducted.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

MR. EDITOR.—In the unavoidable absence of your highly talented correspondent C. who, I perceive, has embarked for Europe, I beg leave to request your insertion of the following communication. Should you deem it worthy of publication, you shall hear from me occasionally, and your politeness will oblige those who feel interested in the prosperity of the drama, and who are anxious to see it properly supported and appreciated in this great emporium. I am aware of the difficulty of properly filling the office for which I am a candidate; but what I want in faculty, I will endeavour to supply by candour and industry. I pledge myself carefully to avoid wantonly wounding the feelings of either author or actor, and likewise, offering the incense of adulation at the shrine of any individual, however high his reputation, being fully convinced that some promising actors have become reckless from unnecessary censure, and more, many more, spoiled by extravagant praise. In acknowledging the superior talents of your friend C. I do but echo the opinions of the majority of our citizens, whom his excellent theatrical portraits have delighted and amused, and by whom they will be read when the subjects of some of them shall have passed to that "bourne from whence no traveller returns." If my efforts should make manager and actors more attentive, and the drama more popular, my ambition will be satisfied—my end attained. My opinions, in many instances, will doubtless be termed singular; but they will be sincere. I shall say precisely what I think; the public is my jury, the theatre my court house, of which, until you issue a warrant of supersedeas, I shall act as judge, and pass sentence according to dramatic laws without fear or favour. A well regulated stage is an ornament to any country; a school for the old, a place of amusement and instruction to the young; where the virtues of past ages are made to live again. It is a bright and glorious vision, planting in the breasts of the rising generation the noble seeds of patriotism.—As a school of oratory alone, waiving its title to the rank of a moral instructor, it is a valuable public establishment.—There the graces of delivery are careful objects of attention, and are cultivated under a combination of aiding circumstances, which no other institution can unite in an equal degree. If this be so, and that it is, no liberal mind can for a moment doubt, the prosperity of the drama is of much importance to the well being of a free and enlightened people.—Were it possible to force back society to a state of primitive barbarism, the first step would be to discountenance the ornamental arts. Man would then retrograde until he finally subsided into a state of listless torpor, or vicious activity.

Little novelty has been produced at the Park during the last fortnight, (th nights having been principally appropriated to the performers' benefits) with the exception of a new musical romance, entitled, "Robert, Duke of Normandy," alias, "Robert the Devil;" a most appalling tissue of nonsense and absurdity. Thunder and lightning are mingled with tumble-down castles and broken hearts; and, in the end, the hero and heroine disappear through a trap-door in admired disorder—a most exquisite device of the author to rid the audience of two very dull and uninteresting persons. This was the best thing in the piece, and should have been resorted to at an earlier period.

The reign of melo dramas and stars of the sixth and seventh magnitude is nearly at an end. "The charm dissolves apace." I shall endeavor to make my next communication more interesting, if this will answer for the present. D.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Vermont Classical Seminary.—This institution, situated in Castleton, one of the most beautiful and salubrious villages in the eastern states, was opened on the twelfth of May last, under the superintendence of Professor Lewis C. Beck, and Mr. Samuel Foot. The course of instruction is arranged in five divisions, to wit:

1. Chemistry and Natural History.
2. Mathematics and Natural Philosophy.
3. Ancient Languages.
4. Modern Languages.
5. English Literature.

Each of these divisions will be under the charge of able instructors, and, from our knowledge of Professor Beck's qualifications, we are induced to form a high estimate of the competency of his assistants. This gentleman has long since distinguished himself by his numerous and valuable contributions to the stores of natural and philosophical science, and given evidence of an acute and observing mind, of the most untiring industry and successful research. His "Gazetteer of the Western States," a work, the variety and learning of which merited for it a far prouder title, justly gained for him an elevated rank among the literary and scientific men of our country, and this rank his essays on chemistry, natural history, and philosophy, which have occasionally appeared in the periodical journals of this country, have eminently contributed to maintain. His appointment as instructor in the Rensselaer school, and as professor of chemistry in the Medical College of Vermont, are decided proofs of the favourable estimation in which his talents and learning are held. His private deportment is such as will ensure to parents the most faithful discharge of a teacher's duties towards their children, for to his attainments in science and experience in the art of instruction, Professor Beck adds the most affable and conciliating manners. The building erected for the accommodation of the school stands on an eminence, and commands an extensive view of a beautiful and fertile country. It is one hundred and sixty feet in length, and forty in breadth, with projections in the centre and extremities, and is three stories high. The basement contains a large dining hall, kitchens, wash-rooms, domestics' rooms, &c. On the second story are the professors' room, a laboratory, a chapel, a public school-room, four private recitation rooms, and fifty dormitories about thirteen feet square, exclusive of a closet, all of which are provided with stoves, beds, tables, desks, &c. To the building is attached a play-ground of about six acres—a part of which is devoted to a garden. The recreations of the pupils will consist, in the summer, in collecting specimens in botany, mineralogy, &c.; during the winter, gymnastic exercises will be taught and practised. The greatest attention will, at all times, be paid to the moral deportment of the youth. There will be two vacations every year; one in April—and another in August. Terms are only two hundred dollars—including tuition, board, furniture, washing, firewood, lights; in short every expense.

We have been thus particular in exhibiting the details of this new Academy, because we feel certain, that it offers peculiar advantages for instruction in the elementary, practical and popular, as well as the higher branches of education, which can be enjoyed but in few other seminaries. And if properly encouraged and fostered, a brilliant career of usefulness and reputation will be opened to its founders and superintendents.

Before closing this article, we must not omit to notice the fact, that, at the opening of the Seminary, a very eloquent and appropriate discourse was delivered by the Rev. William B. Sprague, in which the objects and most successful methods of youthful instruction were pointed out in a lucid and elevated strain of argument. We regret that we have not space to notice this address in detail, as its suggestions are generally applicable and should be generally known. It has been published and may be had at the Parthenon bookstore.

Female wages.—The philanthropist has cause to rejoice for the increase of attention which is paid to this interesting and affecting subject. On a former occasion, the utter inadequacy of the pay received by the moral, industrious, and indefatigable female labourers from their employers was detailed, and the harrowing alternative of a degradation of character, or a deplorable state approaching to starvation, was plainly pointed out. The naked truth has not failed to reach the hearts, and enlist the active sympathies of the humane in our principal cities. Measures have been adopted by the most influential inhabitants, especially of the sex more nearly interested to redeem from poverty and infamy a valuable and numerous class of sufferers. The attempt to remedy this enormous evil by provident societies and even houses of industry, although these may effect some good, is altogether idle. Prices must be raised. The example has been set in Baltimore and should be speedily followed in all our cities. Happy—enviable will be the lot of him who first projected this good, when he shall see the object of his benevolence accomplished.

Water.—We have been very much interested by reading the able report of the committee of the common council appointed to take into consideration the conduct of the Manhattan Water Company. It is made to appear by facts too well and too long known, that this body, appointed for purposes the most important to the health and hourly comforts of the people of this city, has failed to accomplish any object excepting that of enriching itself. The water they have furnished was not such as was promised by the terms of the charter, neither was it obtained from the sources prescribed to them, neither has it been pure or palatable. They have also committed repeated nuisances in destroying pavements—thus actually imposing burdens on the public, and lastly they have withdrawn their fire plugs. All these charges are fully substantiated—and are sufficient to destroy the charter of the company, and break up an odious and injurious monopoly. Let us hope that the subject may not be allowed to rest where it has begun. His honour the Mayor is pledged on the subject of water, and will he not redeem his pledge?

Memorial of the Manhattan Gas Light Company.—The simple and uncontradicted statements contained in this document, which is addressed to the honourable the Mayor, Aldermen and Commonalty of the city of New-York, fully establish the necessity of the adoption of decisive measures on the subject of the illumination of our streets and houses. It has been rendered sufficiently clear that the company already in operation has failed to effect the object for which they were incorporated, and, in the secure enjoyment of a monopoly, have frequently exacted inordinate charges for very unsatisfactory equivalents. The complaints have been loud and daily repeated. Public good requires that the proper authorities should interfere, and it is high time the subject was settled.

The Philadelphia Daily Chronicle.—Among the recent new exchanges with which we have reason to be gratified, that with this valuable journal is not the least. Conducted with decorum and sense, diversified by a great variety of miscellaneous, amusing and instructive matter, it deserves to hold a conspicuous rank among the daily newspapers of the United States. It adds a pleasing instance to many others of the improved style and appearance of these important chronicles of passing events.

Miss Sterling.—The concert given by this interesting young lady, on Tuesday evening, was triumphantly successful.

THE CAMEL DRIVER'S RETURN.

SUNG BY MADAME VESTRIS—COMPOSED BY L. DEVEREAUX.

ALLEGROTTTO E SCHERZANDO.

Morn-ing beams are twink-ling, lis-ten, A-bra, dear, O'er the moun-tains tink-ling, ca-mel bells I hear; With the spright-ly jin-gle, mirth and so-cial glee, Cheer-i-ly doth min-gle, wea-ry though they be.

Tin-gle, tin-gle, tin-gle, wea-ri-ly they go; Tin-gle, tin-gle, tin-gle, faint-er now and slow. Tin-gle, tin-gle, tin-gle, wea-ri-ly they go! Tin-gle, tin-gle, tin-gle, tin-gle, faint-er now and slow.

2d—While the music clinking, of the camel's bell,
Is my Sadi thinking, of his native dell?
Will he soon be greeting, her in lowly vale,
Whose fond heart is beating, his return to hail?

Tingle, tingle, tingle, wearily they go;
Tingle, tingle, tingle, fainter now and slow.
Tingle, tingle, tingle, wearily they go;
Tingle, tingle, tingle, fainter now and slow.

3d—Now the pitcher bearing, from the fountain bright;
Now the cheer preparing, with a footstep light;
Listen, Abra, listen! dost thou hear them still?
Do their trappings glisten, on the distant hill?

Tingle, tingle, tingle, weary travel past;
Smiles of welcome greeting, safe return at last.
Tingle, tingle, tingle, weary did they roam;
Tingle, tingle, tingle, sweet their welcome home.

VARIETIES.

A WEDDING PRESENT.—A curious mistake, which occurred at Paris, has afforded an interesting topic of conversation in the salons there. An actress, who is said to be extremely fond of lobsters, was in the habit of accompanying her friend, a titled gentleman, for a morning drive, and they generally used to alight at the well-known shop of Chevot, where the fair gourmande made choice of her favourite delicacy. The lobster was usually tastefully wrapped up in coloured paper, and placed in the carriage. On the morning in question, however, the lady in her hurry to get to rehearsal, forgot it when they got to the house, and it was left in one of the pockets of the carriage. The gentleman was engaged to a marriage ball in the evening, and, as it is usual upon such occasions to present a nosegay, after leaving his cher amie, he went to purchase one for the bride. The nosegay was put into the carriage, and in the evening, when the gentleman was driven to the house where the ball was to take place, instead of taking the nosegay, he unfortunately took the lobster, for, as they were both wrapped up in a similar paper, it was not possible to distinguish them. When he entered the room, with his supposed fragrant present, all now gaiety, for the guests had begun to "trip it on the light fantastic toe," and he advanced towards the lady, who was figuring away in a quadrille, the paper was opened, when lo! surprise and horror! it unfolded not sweet smelling flowers, but the fatal lobster, which had been forgotten by his fair acquaintance in the morning. The room, of course, resounded with the cry of mirth, and the gentleman retired, covered with confusion. Many jokes were cracked at the unfortunate gentleman's expense; and it is to be hoped that the circumstance will make him more cautious in future.

EXTRACTS FROM GODWIN'S NEW NOVEL, CLOUDESLEY.—"If we are in love we deceive ourselves; we ascribe to the favoured she the most unparalleled and superhuman excellencies. But if we enter into engagements deliberately and in cool blood, we well know that it is a compromise. The creature that our exalted imagination has figured to us does not exist on the face of the earth. Of those that do exist only a small number are accessible to us, or are such as we have the smallest chance to win to favour our addresses. We contentedly give up some of the qualifications we should have desired in the partner of our life, and accept of such as are within our reach."

"The season of jubilee to those by whom a child is truly loved, is when he begins to talk. Words of love and endearment are among the first he utters. How delightful is it to them that his tongue should assure them of what they before learned only from dumb signs and uncertain gestures! It is like the first declaration between a lover and his mistress. No, there was nothing doubtful before, but articulated sounds are as the seal to the bond, and make assurance doubly sure."

"The history of the world in its various climates, the advances of mankind from barbarism to civilization, the inroads to despotism, the struggles for the profligacy and servility of some, and generous elevation of others, with all the varieties of human propensities and human character, presented to me an immense storehouse of observation and wisdom."

"What a dreadful practice is this of duelling, which seems to be so deeply rooted in the habits of modern Europe. The best and most generous of our race are more exposed to its tragical consequences than the ignoble and base. It is said to be indispensable to the keeping up the courtesies of polished society. In that case, those courtesies are bought at a high price. It is held that no man without the deepest disgrace can abstain from the receiving or even the giving a challenge. What can be more barbarous than that two men should go in cold blood to stand out as a mark, or even to press forward as to a mark against the life of a fellow creature for some unintelligible point of imaginary honour? We all confess this, and yet the evil is not remedied! Surely the wit of man ought strenuously and unremittingly to be applied to find out the cure for so tremendous an evil."

A CRITICISM ON STYLE.—In the account given by Sir Walter Scott of Napoleon's interment I read as follows:—"The coffin was then let down into the grave, under a discharge of three successive volleys of artillery, fifteen pieces of cannon firing fifteen guns each." Here we have three synonyms—artillery, cannon, and guns, brought into play in a manner which bids complete defiance to Swift's definition of style, "the use of proper words in proper places." Without advert-ing to the novel phrase of "volleys of artillery," I am at a loss to know how a single discharge of artillery produced three successive volleys, and not less so to comprehend how the cannon fired the guns. With regard to the latter point, indeed, the difficulty, like that of the martyred saint who walked several miles with his head in his hand, consists entirely in the first step; for, if I could understand how one cannon could fire one gun once, I should not be surprised at fifteen pieces of cannon firing fifteen times fifteen guns; though the puzzle would still remain of a simultaneous discharge of three successive volleys from two hundred and twenty five guns. As the burial of an Emperor was not likely to be an every day occurrence at St. Helena, it was a pity that Sir Hudson Lowe did not contrive to add one wonder more to this wonderful firing, by making the guns reciprocate the kind offices of the cannon."

Globe.

GEORGE P. MORRIS, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

Published every Saturday, at the corner of Nassau and Ann streets.—Terms four dollars per annum, payable in advance.—No subscription received for a less period than one year.

J. SETZOUR, PRINTER, JOHN STREET.

NEW-YORK MIRROR.

AND LADIES' LITERARY GAZETTE.

VOLUME VII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 3, 1880.

NUMBER 52.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

TO A LADY.

Who sent her common place book to the author for a contribution.

And dost thou then request a lay
From one to thee unknown?
One, who without that kindling ray
Which bright inspiring eyes convey,
Could never wake a tone?

Alas! the heartless lines I trace
Will have no charms for thee;
For if Peru's untutored race
Had never seen their god's bright face,
How cold their prayers would be.

'Tis true that Fame, in brightest dyes
Her magic pencil dips,
To paint the mental charms I prize
Reflected from thy speaking eyes,
Or warbled from thy lips;

But, ah! however bright we own
The portrait all admire,
The fair original alone
Could waken feeling's purest tone,
From my neglected lyre.

When thou wouldst catch the drowdrops, shook
From fancy's glittering wing,
Let thy own hand present the book,
And with thy own bewitching look
Inspire the bard to sing.

STANZAS.

Though milder skies allure thee hence,
And smiling native scenes invite,
Where fancy to thy view presents
A glowing picture of delight;
No flow'ry vales nor verdant scenes
So sweet a fragrance can impart,
As friendship's tender ever-greens
Nourish'd by memory in the heart.
In ours those plants shall ever bloom,
Freshen'd by tear-drops of regret,
While one sweet hope will light the gloom,
The hope that thou wilt not forget.
But should new friends and joys efface
The forms of those thou leav'st behind,
O let the humble lines I trace
Recall the picture to thy mind.

POPULAR MORAL TALES.

THE NEGLECTED WIFE.

BY A PHYSICIAN.

"Most happy metamorphosis! in which
The film of error that did blind my judgment
And seduced understanding is removed.
What sacrifice of thanks can I return
Her pious charity!"—Messenger.

Among the families in the neighbourhood of my residence, whom I was in the habit of attending in my professional capacity, was that of Mr. Evelyn, a retired merchant. It consisted of himself, Mrs. Evelyn, and two daughters, Mary and Eliza. The elder of the young ladies, whom this narrative particularly concerns, combined with an unusually sound understanding and quick perception, an enthusiasm of character and simplicity of heart, which rendered her more interesting, although she could not have been more amiable, than her younger sister.

Were I in need of a heroine for a romance, and were desirous of clothing her in every attribute of beauty, my recollections of Mary Evelyn should furnish me with materials for the picture. Even at this remote period, for it is some years since I first saw her, her form is floating before my mental vision in all its freshness and beauty; as when I beheld her before she became a wife. I shall not easily forget her: her slender yet exquisitely proportioned form, her beautifully arched eyebrows, her light blue eye, her round and polished forehead, her cheek, which nature had tinted so slightly; and her smile, too, that would have won a kingdom, are all within my mind's eye in the vividness of their reality.

Among the aspirants to Mary's favour, a Mr. Melvin and a Mr. Landen were most conspicuous, both as regarded their pretensions, and the terms on which they stood with her family.

The former gentleman was of an elegant and commanding figure, master of most of the external accomplishments which pertain to gentility, and, withal, possessed that encyclopedical description of knowledge, which, embracing a great variety of subjects, with little profundity upon any, gave him, in point of conversational talent, a great superiority over men of more sterling acquirements. He was most assiduous, nay, devoted, in his attentions to Miss Evelyn; watching all her looks, and anticipating all her wishes, and, from a desire to please, rather than any intention of appearing what he was not, conforming so closely to her habits in many points, where they were dissimilar in their tastes, as almost to deceive himself into a conviction that there was a perfect sympathy between them.

These advantages and his powers of pleasing, which were really of no ordinary cast, coupled with an unblemished reputation, and flattering prospects in life, might well render him the object of favour to a woman of more fastidious taste than even Mary Evelyn.

Mr. Landen, although decidedly inferior to Mr. Melvin in personal appearance, was nevertheless a very interesting young man. His complexion was pale, but his eye was dark and penetrating, and his profile I have rarely seen equalled for correct beauty; it was a perfect study for an artist. Mr. Melvin's face glowed with the hue of health, and his restless blue eye imparted to it a perpetual vivacity. Mr. Landen's, although I have seen it lit up by an animation of which it scarcely appeared susceptible, was, in its general expression, of a calmer and more quiescent kind than Mr. Melvin's. Although Mr. Landen's manners were decidedly those of a gentleman, and were distinguished by an urbanity which could not fail to propitiate all who were acquainted with him, the natural thoughtfulness of his disposition rendered him less generally observant of those little attentions to which the fairer sex conceive themselves, and by acclamation are allowed, to be entitled. Independently of this, although his admiration of Miss Evelyn was as ardent as his respect for her was deep, he possessed a sensibility of a somewhat morbid kind, which rendered the idea of a repulse abhorrent to him, and tended to check those advances in which his bolder rival anticipated him.

These circumstances will enable us, without reflecting upon the lady's discernment, to account for the failure of Mr. Landen's suit, and the success of Mr. Melvin's; to whom, with the full consent of her family, and amid the congratulations of her friends, she was united.

Mr. Landen had a mind too exalted to be reached by so grovelling a passion as envy; but the blow was too much for him, and he left the country shortly after the marriage.

That Mr. Melvin sought the hand of Mary from motives altogether unconnected with any sordid views, was never doubted. He saw her the pride and the flower of the circle in which she moved; he saw rank and riches suing for her favour, and heard every tongue eloquent in her praise; he admired her beauty, her accomplishments, and her talents; and, in thinking that he loved her, he was not, by thousands, the first person who has mistaken the passion by which he has been actuated; and, in an instance like the present, has confounded love with an ambition to possess what was coveted by so many, and thus to achieve a triumph over his competitors for the prize.

It may be inquired, who shall presume to judge between a man's actions and his heart, and decide on which of these motives has influenced him in such a matter? The test is an easy one. Love, if it be sincere, having obtained the prize, is happy in finding it all that it had imagined of its value. Ambition, equally eager in the pursuit, is limitless, and passes on from one conquest to another.

Thus it happened, that, although Mr. Melvin's vanity was gratified in exhibiting the envied attractions of his wife to the admiration of his friends, and the gaze of the world, the gratification ceased with the novelty; and a year had barely elapsed, from the time of their union, ere Mrs. Melvin found that she had not so much of her husband's society as she possessed in the early days of her marriage; that he went out very frequently without her; and, in those parties to which she did accompany him, the attentions he was wont to devote so exclusively to her, were employed in obtaining the favour, and attracting the admiration of others. She was, however, in the course of a few months afterwards, spared the mortification of witnessing the transfer of attentions which she could not but feel were justly due to her; for he seldom or never went out with her; very rarely spent an evening at home; and, when he did, the reserve of his manner plainly indicated that it was irksome to him. He would return from his parties at all hours of the night, utterly regardless of the anxiety his protracted absence would create. In fact, his conduct at last assumed the character of cold neglect of one of the loveliest and most amiable women in creation; and he thus sacrificed to the empty admiration of the world, and to worse than idle pleasures, a being who had resigned all the world for him.

When a woman who, in the generous confidence which ever characterizes her love, has intrusted her happiness to one with whom she deemed it would be secure, finds that she has been betrayed, there is something so terrible and overwhelming in the discovery, that language is altogether inadequate to the description of her feelings.

Poor Mary felt the misery of her situation to its full extent; for there were those who took care that she should not continue in ignorance of any of her husband's faults, but entertain a due sense of her injuries. There are some parents, who, forgetting that their authority over their child ceases with her marriage, and merges in her husband, are perpetually interfering in the concerns of her family; and, as power which is usurped is usually abused, most generally augment domestic dissensions, if they do not originate them. Mrs. Melvin's parents were of the number of those "miserable comforters," and were the first to counsel her to upbraid her husband for his treatment, and to meet it with what they were pleased to designate a "becoming spirit."

Out upon such meddlers! The knowledge a woman possesses of her husband's errors beyond what she can correct, heaven knows, is superfluous; and thankless is their office that would tell her of them.

Mrs. Melvin did not fail to show a "becoming spirit" upon the occasion; but it was a "spirit of health," not the "goblin damned," whose name is legion, for it pervades, not one family, alas! but many, making a hell where there should be heaven, and producing those awful dissensions between them whom heaven has joined, by which they forfeit the respect of their children, incur the ridicule of the world, and bring scandal upon the religion they profess to venerate.

But Mrs. Melvin needed not to be reminded of her husband's errors: she had long known and wept bitterly over them. She mourned over the crushed hopes of her young heart, and she mourned also for him; but she knew that the voice of upbraiding had few charms to win him back from the perilous path into which he had strayed; and that to fill his home with complaints was not calculated to make him seek it the oftener. She did not, however, trust to the uncertain deductions of human reason as a rule of conduct. She looked to Him who is a guide and a counsellor in every difficulty, and a comforter in every affliction; and who not only points out the path in which we should walk, but supplies us with a powerful motive for pursuing it. She had pledged herself at His altar to adhere to her husband in sickness; and his was indeed a grievous sickness, for it was that of the soul. She knew that she could not extricate herself from her situation, distressing as it was, without violating the law of her Maker; and deeming that a plain indication of His will that she should suffer, she needed no other motive for patience.

But, although all her actions bore the stamp of strong religious principle, there was no parade of it. Her virtues were unobtrusive; like the lily, the emblem at once of her beauty and humility, they delighted in the shade, and needed not the stimulus of the world's gaze to bring them into action.

Mr. Melvin, among other accomplishments for which his society was coveted, possessed an uncommonly fine voice, and an exquisite taste for music; talents which, before his marriage, had, notwithstanding his devotion to Mary, led him more into company than was agreeable to her; but she had trusted that such a home as she hoped to make his, would possess attractions which would wean him from the companions of his youthful days.

But, alas! although the first year had flattered her with the appearance of success, she found, too early, that society had regained its hold upon him; and his connexions did not improve as they extended. What is called gay, is closely allied to profligate society. Indeed, if the terms thus applied be not synonymous, the transition from the one description of company to the other is easy and imperceptible. Although he was an illustration of the proverb, "Nemo repente fuit turpissimus," the gradations of his descent were soon completed; and his ruin, which began its career in gaiety, was consummated by the race-course and the gaming table.

The result was, that in about three years after his marriage with Miss Evelyn, his affairs becoming embarrassed, and his creditors impatient, he was thrown into prison for the debts he was unable to meet. The shock, although he might have anticipated the event, was a severe one to him. Reflection, which may be drowned in the shouts of revelry, or escaped from in the whirl of dissipation, is not to be parried in a prison. It is there her mirror is held up to us, and we cannot choose but gaze upon it. He looked back upon the latter years of his life, and thought of the hours he had squandered among companions, and on pursuits, to whose utter worthlessness he was now awakened by the bitterest remorse. He well knew that not a voice among all those who had flattered him in the day of his pride, would awaken an echo in the vaulted roof which hung frowning above him: for those whom he had once called friends had dropped away from him in his adversity like the leaves from a frost-smitten tree, which are fresh and full upon its branches at evening, but, when sought for in the morning, they are scattered and gone. He looked back through the dark vista of his folly and crimes, on the happiness which was once in his power, and he thought of the blind infatuation in which he had cast it from him. He thought of the name he had lost, and the fortune he had wasted, and both were irretrievable. He thought of his wife, of his neglected, his injured Mary—of her tears, whose mute eloquence had so often pleaded with him in his own behalf—of her smile, which should have won him back to virtue; and he felt that there was not one being beside himself who would thus have —"wandered wild and wide

With such an angel for his guide."

Poverty, imprisonment, and the world's scorn, are all, in themselves, endurable afflictions: it is the consciousness of having merited them which renders them insupportable, and it was this aggravation that had armed each with a double sting, and tortured him to madness.

He was roused from his gloomy meditations by the approach of footsteps—his door opened, he looked up, and Mary stood before him!

It is not easy to describe, nor is it perhaps possible to conceive, to their full extent, the feelings of a man whose offences have placed a gulf between him and those whose presence alone could console him, and who, while tortured by the goading consciousness of his shame, is surprised by a visit from one whom even his baseness and ingratitude could not estrange. If it be a friend, how tenaciously does he cling to him as a drowning mariner to a plank! but, if it be a woman who has thus sought him out in his misery, how does his heart, upon which pride would set a guard in the presence of his fellow man, gush out in gratitude and tenderness; and with what eagerness does he rush to hide his shame in the only bosom in the world that does not scorn or hate him, and which even the loathsome leprosy of his crimes could not repel from his arms! Oh, what a relief must it be to his bursting heart and burning brain, though his self upbraidings should flow faster than his tears!

Such were the feelings of Melvin upon meeting his wife in prison, for his heart, though lamentably corrupted, was not of adamant.

Mrs. Melvin "her soul-subduing voice applied," to moderate the ebullitions of his anguish and remorse. "My husband," she said, "all is not lost."

"Call me not husband," said the wretched man, hastily interrupting her. "I have forfeited every claim to the title. I have been the willing slave of every unhallowed passion, and the associate of profligates and fools, and you must, you cannot but despise me."

"Oh, no!" said Mary, "or you had not seen me here. I have mourned for your desertion of a home which you might have made happy, and I have wept over your aberrations from the path which you might have adorned; but, believe me, I ever loved you, and gladly would I become the tenant of this dungeon for the remnant of my days, if it would purchase back for you the happiness which you have lost; yet it may again be yours!"

"No," Melvin replied, "it may not be. Could my liberation be effected, degradation and shame, the world's contumely, and my self-aborrence, will follow me to the grave."

Mrs. Melvin had not encouraged in her husband the hope of obtaining his liberty without good reason, for all her property, over which she had any influence, was unreservedly sacrificed to effect the object; and as soon as he was released she retired with him to a cottage which, with a small annuity, had been settled on her by her father.

Adversity had, however, wrought a change in Mr. Melvin; he was no longer what he had been; he turned with disgust from his former companions and habits, to her whom he now hailed as his guardian angel. He had, indeed, in his prison light enough to perceive his danger, but not sufficient to discover a way to escape from it. He had begun to look back upon his past life with abhorrence and fear—a crisis at which despair or a saving repentance awaited him. "Wo to him," saith the preacher, "that is alone when he falleth!" and surely if, while the waters of affliction were gathering around him, there had been none to extend the hand of encouragement when his heart was failing him, the stream had gone over his soul, and whelmed it for ever in the gulf of despair.

Mr. Melvin's constitution had been materially impaired by the irregular life he had led previously to his imprisonment, and it was not a year after his release when I was summoned to his chamber.

His illness was severe and lingering, and she who had been his comfort in sorrow, was his nurse in sickness; she attended him by night and day with the most unwearied assiduity, the most endearing tenderness.

The vigils of the sick-room had indeed blanched her cheek, and dimmed the lustre of her eye; but the smile of her affection had lost none of its sweetness, and when she smoothed down his pillow or supported his frame, it beamed upon his countenance as the smile of an angel.

To him who, in his estimation of woman's love, typifies its constancy by the breeze, and its duration by the flower, I would say, "Go to the chamber of sickness or the dungeon of the captive, and you shall behold that flower braving the bitterest blast of adversity, and perishing only with the object to which it clings."

But the voice of affection wins not upon the ear of death, who had summoned him to his home. He met the stroke with fortitude, and expressed a confident hope that, although his sins had been many and grievous, He who had given him time and grace to repent of them, would remember him in His kingdom."

Whether his confidence was a well-grounded one, and of what avail will be his repentance who, bankrupt in reputation, fortune, and friends, flies to his Redeemer as a last resource, it may by some be deemed presumptuous to determine. We know, however, that the prodigal, abandoned even by the companions of his sin and his shame, was forgiven by his father, and that they who were willing to enter into the vineyard, even at the eleventh hour, were not rejected. We know, also, that it has often pleased God, by sudden calamity, to arrest a man in his desolating career of sin, and yet he has so mingled mercy with judgment, that the benighted sinner has been guided to the rock of salvation by the lightnings of the wrath which his crimes have provoked.

Notwithstanding the sacrifices which had been made by Mrs. Melvin, her husband's affairs were so much embarrassed at the time of his death that the furniture of the cottage was given up to his creditors. Other motives than curiosity induced me to attend the sale, and, having arrived at the house some time before it commenced, I wandered through the apartments in which the furniture was disposed.

There is a propensity in our nature to identify things with the persons whom we have loved or admired, and which causes us to feel regret when they pass into strange hands. In every room I beheld something that strikingly reminded me of the amiable being whom sorrow and distress had driven from that abode. In one room was her harp, the companion of her youth, and the solace of her later years. When I first saw her, she was bending over that harp; and often have I sat by her side, as it were, spell-bound by strains so thrilling and so sweet, as almost to suggest a doubt if the hand that awakened them were fashioned of clay. It was sad to think that that hand would never wake them again; and I could almost have deemed it better that every chord had snapped with its last vibration to her touch than have yielded its melodies to the hand of another.

In many of the drawings which adorned the walls I recognised the pencil of Mary, for its touches were as delicate as the hand it obeyed. Among them I observed a miniature of herself, which she had painted at Melvin's earnest solicitation.

The cold eye of the critic, thought I, may glance over it, and discover defects which, in the original, he had searched for in vain. Her library, too, was destined to be scattered. I opened some of the volumes. Her name, written by herself, was in the title pages, and I thought that the hand that obliterated it could not write a worthier in its place. There were flowers, too, which she had planted, and with which she loved to decorate her little drawing-room; but they had missed her fostering care, and were hanging their heads, while some of them, like her own young hopes, were withering in the bud, as if they scorned to shed their blossoms at the feet of the stranger. A melancholy feeling stole over me as I contemplated the scene, and I could not endure to think that those things which, by an association of ideas I had almost deemed sacred, should be labelled by the awkward praises of the hired eulogist of chairs and tables, and become subjects of the clamorous contention and of the jests, dull as they are coarse, which make up the Babel of an auction room.

While the auctioneer was pronouncing his exordium, I observed a tall thin gentleman enter the room, and afterwards, somewhat to my surprise, compete for every lot that was put up for sale with such perseverance and total recklessness of cost, that he became the purchaser of each. The portrait of Mr. Melvin was among the things exhibited, and, as it was painted by an artist of eminence, some sharp contest took place, particularly on the part of one person, who appeared to derive a gratification from the chagrin evinced by the stranger, as he found himself outbidden at every advance by the sole remaining competitor. At length I observed a sudden flush upon the stranger's brow, and, in a tone of voice highly indicative of impatience, he named a sum which left competition altogether behind, and the picture became his. A contest nearly similar in its progress, and altogether so in its issue, occurred when the miniature of Mrs. Melvin was produced. The stranger, in fact, became the purchaser of every thing the house contained, at a price far beyond its value, and the premises were gradually cleared of those who came to the sale. I lingered almost to the last, and found myself in the room alone with the stranger. I looked up, and it was Landen, "the ghost of what he was"—"the shadow of a shade."

"Doctor," he said, "you may indeed appear surprised at meeting me in this house, as well as at the object which has led me hither. I heard of poor Melvin's death, and read in the papers that the furniture of his cottage had been destined for sale for the benefit of his creditors. You know the feelings I entertained for Mary Evelyn. We cannot bestow our affection were we please, nor will it come back to us at our beck. Her marriage did not blot her out from existence, nor her image from my mind. I will not say that the feeling I retained for her after that event was love. Let those who deal in terms give it what name they please. I know that it is such as may be cherished without sin, and owned without a blush. The ivy, torn from the object to which it would have clung until it withered, may be too deeply rooted to perish, though the day of its aspirations be past. The house which she has graced with her presence must not be made a desert; and I would that when she returns to it she find every thing as she left it, and therefore have I done what you have witnessed. To-morrow will see me on my way from England to visit it no more; and I leave to you the arrangement of the matter in such a way that she may never know who has restored to her the furniture of her dwelling. Simply tell her that it is her own again. I shall make but one reserve of all my purchases," added he, taking up the miniature and depositing it in his bosom; "having once possessed, I cannot summon the courage to resign it."

The arrangement was made in strict conformity to Mr. Landen's directions, and Mrs. Melvin ever remained in ignorance of the author of an act, which, while it paid a delicate tribute to her feelings and to her worth, afforded a proof, not only of the strength, but of the exalted purity of his affection.

The result of Mr. Landen's disregard of cost, and determination to purchase every article of furniture the house possessed, was that the amount produced by the sale was more than adequate to satisfy the demands of the creditors of Mr. Melvin; and the annuity, which was settled upon his widow, enabled her to continue to reside at the cottage, which, notwithstanding his faults, the memory of her husband had endeared.

MISS MITFORD'S RESIDENCE.—A writer in a late English periodical thus describes the "Mitford cottage." "It is a pretty but fairy spot. You might place it in a band-box on a shelf, or hang it like a bird-cage on a tree; it suffices, however, for the wants and wishes of a descendant of the noble house of Russell."

DEFERRED ARTICLES.

NIBLO'S GARDEN.

Our daily contemporaries have been liberal of their praises of this terrestrial paradise (such is the appellation that by common consent has been bestowed upon it;) but after all their labours, Niblo's Garden still remains a shining example of the inadequacy of words, which are but empty wind, and of types, which, to make the best of them, are but dull-looking articles, to do justice to such unrivalled splendour and beauty as are to be found within its gorgeous walks, and among its exquisite decorations. It is a pity that Moore the poet, will not again visit our shores; there is no writer, that we know of, who could describe Niblo's Garden of delights as it ought to be described, except the author of Lalla Rookh: how he would luxuriate upon its bowers and temples, and shady walks, and glittering lights, and its rich music, and its unsurpassable eatables and drinkables, and yet more upon the graceful forms and sparkling eyes and delicious lips that meet the enraptured gaze, and ruin the defenceless hearts of our unhappy bachelors within its charmed precincts! What pen but Moore's could do justice to the splendours of the princial walk—the alley of the glittering arches, the extent of which by the effect of the admirable and ingenious optical deception at the one end, and the magnificent mirror at the other, appears to be without limits? or, to the sea nymphs' bowers? or to the sweet voices, that night after night, pour out such honied words of praise and admiration, as their lovely owners gaze enraptured on them? We think Niblo must be a most enviable man, at least whenever it does not rain. Praise is very sweet, no matter where it comes from; but to be praised by every body—by the learned and the witty and the lovely—by joyous youth and severe old age—by the lovers of beautiful sights and the worshippers of harmonious sounds, and the idolaters of good eating and drinking—Mr. Niblo, Mr. Niblo, you are a happy man, even though your own eyes should enjoy not, and your own ears be palled, and dyspepsia should forbid your own gastronomic organs to partake of the delights which you are so skilled in providing for the appetites of others.

We do not remember to have seen in any of the papers a history of this garden. Within our remembrance it was nothing but a square unoccupied ground, with "not a shrub or tree or bit of plant green," within its desolate enclosure. Some ten or twelve years since, it was taken possession of by a wandering tribe of vagabond equestrians and rope-dancers, who exhibited fly-flaps and somersets, and ground and lofty tumbling and feats of very equivocal horsemanship, for the edification of the enlightened public, and the guerdon of sixpence (or rhaps a shilling) per man, that being the honorarium, by the disbursement whereof admittance might be purchased to the inner side of the envious high fence which then, as now surrounded the vacant lot. In those days, we were often truant school-boy; but alas! not often blessed with the possession of the requisite amount of mammon to enable us to become a privileged spectator; and we well remember the eagerness with which we were wont to seek for knot-holes and gaping crevices in the cruel fence, through which our aging eyes might be regaled with the sight of the wonders that were going on within, and the nervous state of anxiety to which we were occasionally thrown by the suspicion it we could not but entertain, of evil from the hand of some money-taker, or prowling underling of the troupe should we be detected in this illegitimate satisfaction of curiosity; and the horrors that beset us as we hurried hewards when the performances were over, resulting from our unshakable conviction that a wholesome flogging awaited there for the "dallying dear delay" of our return from school. In process of time, the wandering troupe became regular company; a real, permanent circus was established; we grew up to the acquisition of time and money, and became the master of our own actions, so that we might gaze upon our fill upon the riders, and the jumpers, and the ablers, without any fear of the keepers or cross-grained jockeys. But alas, when the power to acquire was attained the capacity to enjoy was gone; and circuses and the dead heat are done within them became to us as things of no count. Oh the mutability—but this is no place or time to talize. Let us return to Niblo's Garden.

Years came and passed away, and found us a wanderer in foreign and far-off lands; pleasant places that had known us in happy boyhood knew no longer; and the very memory of our youthful and belated haunts grew faint and feeble in the collision of active life and the wear and tear of earnest occupation. We returned to our native land, and the city where our youth was past, a man; and for months it was our delight to visit once more those old and almost forgotten scenes to which we had been so long a stranger, and to try to recognise familiar places amid the changes they too had undergone. Among these was the quondam circus, now Niblo's Garden. It had endured the greatest transformation of the whole: we entered and found the once waste land, now laid out in walks, and blooming with shrubs, and trees, and flowers; active and careful and attentive waiters were swiftly gliding about among crowds of happy faces, where horses had pranced and vaulters had run and bounded, and clowns with party-coloured caps and grotesque garments had lavished their unmeaning grins and coarse practical jokes upon a slender company of wondering spectators. The sweet strains of violins and flutes and horns and beautiful voices, had supplied the place of the rattling tambourine: and a creating spirit of taste and enterprise and order, had converted a den of thieves into an enchanted garden of pleasure. Our heart was full, and we retired to a shady arbour with a cream, and meditated upon the mutations of this most changeable world.

VIVA LA MUSICA.

The season of harmony and melody is now drawing to a close in that temple of Apollo, the Park theatre. The mellifluous voices of flutes and clarionets begin to experience the sharpening effects of heat, and the violins have become susceptible of a flat languor. Frequently the expressive countenance of Mr. De Luce is observed to turn a reproachful glance at the inflators of wood, giving them note A in a perturbed manner; who, in their turn, look gloomily at the "ever angry" men of fiddles, whose temper is not proof against the frequent rupture of strings which takes place. Even the human diapason becomes affected by the atmosphere; and art and nature unite in crying "hold, enough."

Before we bid a temporary adieu to the professors of this charming science, it may not be amiss to cast one retrospective glance at the progress of the lyrical drama during the season.

Three new operas have been produced with success. The first, entitled "The Caliph of Bagdad," has given us an entire work of the great master Boieldieu, an acquisition of first-rate importance in our musical annals. The second, a pleasing operetta in two acts, "Music and Prejudice," has furnished some beautiful melodies, and particularly that called "The Soldier's Tear," which has been presented to the public in a former number of the Mirror. This piece has likewise placed our highly gifted countryman, Placide, in a most favourable point of view, and in a line of business which he has made exclusively his own. The third, is the opera of "Rokeby," a spirited and matter-of-fact version of Scott's poem. This piece has afforded us not only an opportunity of hearing a selection of music of the best masters, hitherto unknown to an American audience, but has presented us with as brilliant a spectacle as the united talents of author, musician, and machinist could well accomplish. Such have been the novelties of the season. For the standard genus of opera, we have had "The Barber of Seville," "The Tempest," "The Marriage of Figaro," and "Artaxerxes;" but Weber's splendid "Der Freyschutz" has been missing. We trust that we shall be greeted by its witcheries and almost unearthly music next season. Mr. Jones is well calculated for the part of Adolph; but for Caspar, if we exclaim where? echo answers "where?" "Oberon," also, the beautiful and classic, but alas, the dying effort of Weber, of which the poetry is worthy of the music—composed in England, translated into German, and received with enthusiasm all over the continent of Europe—why are we not to be favoured by its reproduction? Two years have elapsed since it was coldly received at the Park. True; but two years have passed over a people rapidly improving in taste; and surely we have amateurs enough of the right sort to remove such a stain from our musical escutcheon. Before we babble about this or the other Italian composer, at least it behoves us to know and appreciate the music of our native tongue, in which the French, Germans, and Italians set us a notable example; and although we witness with pleasure the success of new pieces, and the introduction of both Italian and French opera in our city, yet we wish to impress upon our readers the fact, that we are as yet only partially acquainted with the sacred and secular compositions of great masters, whose works ought to form the basis of our musical education, and the model of our taste. It remains for us now to cast a glance at our fair singing birds. During the summer, we understand that Madame Feron and Miss George may be heard in certain trees in Niblo's cool retreat. That indefatigable person has likewise endeavoured to secure the talents of Mrs. Austin; but it appears the worthy manager of the Park has adduced weighty arguments to prove that her exclusive services in New-York should be confined to the prima donna-ship of the theatre, with the exception of charitable concerts and oratorios. We thus lose one of the brightest ornaments of Niblo's aviary; however, in our satisfaction at discovering that the fair vocalist is retained among us for another season, and trusting that she may benefit by secession from toil, and by salubrious sea-breezes, we cease to regret a temporary estrangement. The band at Niblo's, led by Segura—unquestionably the best player in America—is remarkably strong in violins; but the wind instruments are defective, especially the horns. Mr. Boyle is the tenor singer, and Rosich is the jay of the establishment, with all that bird's vivacity and imitative qualities, and with about as much music in his voice.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

CURIOUS PREDICTIONS.

There are several predictions extant which have threatened Mahometanism a long while. Bibliander affirms, "that there is a famous prophecy among the Mahometans, which strikes a great terror both in men and women, and which says, 'that the empire shall be destroyed by the sword of the Christians.' The prophecy is expressed in the following words, which are translated out of Persian into Latin, by Georgievitz: 'Our emperor shall come, shall take the kingdom of the Gentiles, shall take the red apple, shall subdue it even unto seven years; if the sword of the Gentiles shall not rise again, he shall reign over them twelve years, shall build a house, shall plant a vineyard, shall enclose gardens with a hedge, shall have a son and a daughter; after twelve years, the sword of the Christians shall rise up, which shall beat back the Turk.' Sansovin published a book in 1570, wherein he affirms, 'that there is a prediction 'that the laws of Mahomet shall last no longer than a thousand years, and that the empire of the Turks shall fall under the fifteenth sultan.' He adds, 'that Leo the philosopher, emperor of Constantinople, has said, in one of his books, 'that a light-haired family, with its competitors, shall put all Mahometanism to flight, and shall seize him who is possessed of the seven mountains.' The same emperor makes mention of a column which was at Constantinople, whose inscriptions the patriarch of the place explained, and said that they signified 'that the Venetians and Muscovites shall take the city of Constantinople; and after some disputes, they shall choose, with one consent, and crown a Christian emperor.' This light-haired family, so fatal to the Mussulmen, puts me in mind of a passage of Dr. Spon, which I shall set down. 'Of all the Christian princes, there is none, whom the Turk fears so much as the great czar of Muscovy;—and I have heard some Greeks say, and among the rest, the Sieur Manno-Mannea, a merchant of the city of Arta, a man of wit and learning for that country, that there was a prophecy among them which imported, 'that the empire of the Turk was to be destroyed by a nation chrysogenos, that is, light-haired; which cannot be attributed to any but the Muscovites, who are almost all light-haired.' There is mention made of this in the 'Miscellaneous Thoughts on Comets,' on occasion of I know not what tradition, which is current, 'that the fates have promised the French the glory of destroying the Turks.' The prophecy of the Abyssinians mentions only a Christian king, who shall be born in the north. 'Mecca, Medina, and the other cities of Arabia Felix, shall hereafter be destroyed, and the ashes of Mahomet and his priests be dissipated; and that some Christian prince, born in the northern regions, shall perform all this, who shall also seize on Egypt and Palestine.' It is pretended that a book was written in Arabic concerning this prophecy, before the taking of Damietta, and that this book was found by the Christians. Willichius relates, 'that the Turks find in their annals, that the reign of Mahomet shall continue until the arrival of the light-haired boys.' Some think that this denotes the Swedes; but Antony Torquato, a famous astrologer, applies it to the king of Hungary. Bayle

FABLE FROM THE POLISH OF GASZYSKI.

Near a dew drop, there fell a tear upon a tomb, whither an unhappy female, beautiful as an angel, repaired every morning to weep for her lover. As the sun's golden disk rose higher in heaven, his rays fell on the tear and the dew drop, but glanced with double brilliancy on the pearl shook from the tresses of Aurora. The liquid jewel, proud of its lustre, addressed its neighbour: "How darest thou appear thus solitary and lusterless? The modest tear made no answer; but the zephyr that just then was wanting on the dew drop, brushed down with its wings the dew drop, and folding the humble tear of affliction, carried it up to heaven.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

THE RAMBLER.—NUMBER TWENTY-FOUR.

MEN OF GENIUS.

"WHAT a piece of work is man!"—What a puzzle to his species! In the mass of human beings which daily pass before our eyes, no two faces are to be found alike, and no two people with the same habits, manners, and disposition. True, the broad and distinctive features may appear the same in all; but every individual has innumerable little traits of character and ways of thinking and acting, which mark him with the stamp of individuality. This has been the case with all who have passed away from the earth, and with all who are on it, and it will be with the motley myriads that futurity will in due time bring forth; and yet there are many literary coarsers, with hard and costive brains, who are afraid that the sources of book-making will be dried up, and that future poets, dramatists, moralists, and satirists, will lack matter whereon to exercise their fancies. Let any man look upon the world with his eyes and perceptions open, and he will soon be convinced that there is no prospect of a scarcity of knaves, fools, coxcombs, flirts, pseudo-sentimentalists, mock-misanthropes, and other legitimate subjects for scorn or laughter. The most common, every-day people, now-a-days, are decidedly geniuses, though of a very peculiar genus.

Among these is the misguided youth, who, on the strength of having seen some of his effusions in print, scorns afterwards to be linked to society like a mere man. He has read that great men were eccentric, and straightway imagines that eccentricity will make him a great man: he therefore plays all sorts of pranks—disturbs sober companies with habits, conversation, and actions, totally repugnant to theirs—breaks engagements, and neglects honest industry,—but expects all this to be excused as the eccentricities of genius. And what are nine-tenths of these people? Men who spin wordy poetry, or weak prose in the shape of sonnets and paragraphs, and who in fact have not a glimmering of poetic feeling or common sense about them; and though they may be laughed at by the few, they are looked upon with more consideration by the many than if they had never exposed themselves. Let complaining authors say what they will, the faculty of putting a certain quantity of words together which may arrive at the dignity of print, is much overrated. The unthinking part of the public have a vague, undefined feeling of respect for such a person, and treat him with a consideration ten times above his merit; while at the same time they boldly laugh at another who orally makes a fool of himself; as if it were harder or more creditable to write nonsense than to talk it. The mass of inanerodomontade, in particular, which is continually appearing in respectable periodicals under the head of original poetry, is fearful. Not that it is all decidedly bad, but what is perhaps worse—too middling to be laughed at. How easily people are apt to mistake a love of poetry for a capability for composing it. Any person on earth can string "twilight shade" and "silent glade," or any other rhyming couplets together, if they give way to such habits; but to infuse any thing like thought, or feeling, or imagination into rhyme, is a very different thing indeed. Half of these productions which are praised by editors, and their authors invested with a little local fame, do not in reality amount to any thing. They are generally the production of some decently-educated and weak-minded young lady or gentleman, who has been spoiled by flattery, light reading, incipient love, and spending summer months in the country; and natural good feelings, which if fully developed and properly applied, would be the cause of cheerfulness and happiness to their owner, are twisted and exaggerated by vain attempts at "original poetry." The only excuse for this is, that now-a-days it is really looked upon as discreditable to have neither genius nor pretension to it; and pretty ladies toss their heads and regard honest, common-sense lovers in a way that is apt to drive any man who wishes for a wife, to pistols or poetry—physical or mental suicide. I once met a melancholy example of this awkward necessity for genius. An acquaintance of mine had fallen in love with a fair damsel, possessed of youth, beauty, and sixty thousand dollars; and it was understood among their friends that they were happy in what poets term "reciprocity of feeling." The important preliminaries having been duly adjusted, the expectant bridegroom bought a house for ten thousand dollars, and began to look upon himself as pretty comfortably settled in the world. Imagine his horror, when he received a brief note from his "gentle Desdemona," who stated that she found it impossible to love him with such a deep love as was described in Byron; and requested, as a personal favour, that he would look upon the tender passages which might have occurred between them "as a mere dream." He afterwards discovered that her heart had been assailed by a young romance-reading, rhyme-making, moon-gazing son of the muses; the author of certain pieces in some nameless hebdomadal, under the modest signature of Apollo Belvedere; which have been pronounced by the best judges to be altogether superior to any thing that ever before appeared in print.

It is some consolation, however, for an ordinary human being to know, that your great geniuses are not always the most prosperous or happy men in the sequel. I knew a worthy cordwainer, whose trade yielded him all the common comforts of life; when he unfortunately imagined he was gifted with a genius for mechanics. He invented a machine to be used as a substitute for cider-mills. A few experimental agriculturists bought up his first models; and it set the poor fellow crazy. He flung his strap and lap-stone out of the window, took down the equivocal likeness of a boot and shoe, which had long informed those interested where he pursued his useful labours, and degenerated into a poor machine-making, beer-drinking, tavern-haunting vagabond; boring every man whom he could secure by the button, with dissertations on wheels, screws, pulleys, self-propelling velocipedes, and perpetual motion.

Men of real genius, as Burns and Byron for instance, are often victims to their own inwardly preying feelings, and subjects of painful anxiety to their friends; but these pseudo-geniuses, which spring up suddenly, like mushrooms, in large cities, are great nuisances; and yet, as it is the principle of a republican government to let the majority rule, the time may come, and that soon, when a mere man of sense will be ashamed to show his face in society.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

PORTRAITS OF CELEBRATED CHARACTERS.

HENRY KIRKE WHITE.

THERE are few men with names inscribed on the imperishable records of genius, whose lives present a more melancholy subject for reflection, than that of Henry Kirke White. Endowed with poetical talents of the first description, and possessing that shrinking modesty and over-refinement of feeling which so frequently are the result of a poetical temperament, he had to struggle with poverty and obscurity until, in the language of Byron's beautiful description of him,

"Keen were his pangs, but keener far to feel;
"He nursed the pinion which impelled the steel;
"While the same plumage that had warmed his nest,
"Drank the last life-drop of his bleeding breast."

This delightful poet was born in Nottingham, March 21, 1785. His father was a tradesman in that city. He early discovered a great desire for reading; and, it is said by his biographers, that when he was about seven years of age, he would creep unperceived into the kitchen, to teach the servant to read and write; a practice he continued for some time before it was discovered that he had been so laudably employed. It was the intention of his father, to bring him up to his own business; but his mother, who was a woman of respectable family and superior acquirements, overcame her husband's desire, and made every effort to procure him a good education; and with this intention, and by the request of her friends, she opened a ladies' boarding and day-school at Nottingham, in which she succeeded beyond her most sanguine expectations; and by these means accomplished her wishes.

It was, however, at length determined to make him acquainted with some trade; and as hosiery is the staple manufacture of his native place, he was placed in a stocking-loom, at the age of fourteen. This employment was entirely uncongenial to his taste, and rendered him truly unhappy: his feelings at this period are portrayed in his address to Contemplation.

His mother, who was the repository of all his boyish sorrows, was extremely anxious to have him removed to some other business; and on his attaining his fifteenth year, had him placed in an attorney's office: but as no premium could be given with him, he was not articulated until two years afterwards.

The law was now the chief object of his attention; but during his leisure hours he acquired a knowledge of Greek and Latin, and also made himself master of many of the modern languages. These employments, with the studies of chemistry, astronomy, drawing, and music, of which he was passionately fond, served as relaxations from the dry study of the law.

He now became a member of a literary society in Nottingham, where his superior abilities procured him to be elected a professor of literature. He wrote occasionally for the Monthly Preceptor. (a miscellany of prose and poetical compositions,) and gained a silver medal for a translation from Horace; and, the following year, a pair of twelve-inch globes, for an imaginary tour from London to Edinburgh.

These little testimonies of his talents were grateful to his feelings, and urged him to further efforts; accordingly, we find him contributing to the Monthly Mirror, which fortunately procured him the friendship of Mr. Capel Lloft, and Mr. Hill, the proprietor of the work. An anecdote is related of him, during his connexion with this work, which is highly interesting. His modesty prevented him from confiding the efforts of his muse to any other criticism than that of his own family. They, however, were proud of the young poet's talents, and would occasionally show portions of his works to their friends. The natural envy which genius is sure to excite, prevented these pieces from being justly appreciated, and Henry was subjected to some ridicule on their account. One friend, in particular, was extremely sarcastic on the occasion, and calling on the family one day, while the young poet was present, he produced a number of the Monthly Mirror, and directed Henry's attention to a poem which it contained, saying, "when you can write like this, you may set up for a poet." White cast his eyes over the article, and found it was one of his own performances. He informed his friend of the fact; and it may well be imagined experienced no small gratification in thus disarming the satire of his ungenerous antagonist.

At the request of Mr. Hill, he was induced, at the close of 1802, to publish a small volume of poems, with the hope that the profits might enable him to prosecute his studies at college, and qualify him to take holy orders, to which he had a strong inclination. He was persuaded to dedicate the work to the Countess of Derby, the once fascinating actress Miss Farren, to whom he applied; but she returned a refusal, on the ground that she never accepted such compliments. Her refusal was, however, couched in kind and complimentary language, and enclosed two pounds as her subscription. The Duchess of Devonshire was next applied to, who after a deal of trouble, consented, but took no further notice of the author.

He enclosed a copy of his little work to each of the then existing Reviews, stating, in a feeble manner, the disadvantages under which he was struggling, and requesting a favourable and indulgent criticism. The Monthly Review, then a leading journal, affected to sympathize with the penury and misfortune of the author, but spoke in such illiberal and acrimonious terms of the productions as to inflict a wound on his mind which was never wholly healed. Ample justice was subsequently done to his memory, through this very review, by the laureate Southey, whose "Life and Remains of White" is justly considered an ornament to British biography.

He now determined to devote himself to the church. His employers agreed to cancel the terms of his apprenticeship, and freely gave up the portion of him that remained unexpired, and further exerted themselves in his behalf. The difficulties that presented themselves were numerous. At length, with the aid of a few friends he was enabled to enter the university of Cambridge; where his intense application to study speedily brought on an alarming disease, which at length terminated in his death, on Sunday, October 19, 1806.

A generous tribute to his worthful talents has been paid to his memory by a native of this county, Francis Boot, Esq. of Boston, who, on a visit to Cambridge, caused a splendid monument, executed by Chantry, to be erected in All-Saints' church, Cambridge; and which remains as a striking contrast to the apathy and neglect with which the unfortunate poet was treated during his life.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Sketches of Public Characters, drawn from the Living and the Dead. With notices of matters. By Ignatius Loyola Robertson. LL.D. a resident of the United States. New-York: E. Bliss. 12mo. p259. 1830.

[SECOND PAGE.]

We open this volume again, and find that it improves upon acquaintance. Yet, although the author appears well conversant with his subjects, and has made some sensible remarks respecting style, language, &c. he is not himself entirely free from carelessness. His book, however, will be deservedly popular; and, as it is probable a second edition will be called for, we trust it will undergo a careful revision.

We make room for the following brief sketches of some of our favourite poets. There are, many others, of great merit, for whose names we have searched in vain.

PERCIVAL.—Doctor James Percival has devoted more of his time to poetry, than most of his brothers of the tuneful choir. He has written enough to make a very considerable volume. His Prometheus, although not so much read as many of his other works, is full of deep philosophy and fine poetry. His smaller pieces are in every magazine and newspaper in the country. His language is copious, smooth, and well chosen. He unites much of the strength of Aken-side with the sweetness of Kirke White. His elements are all poetical; and if his whole time were devoted to writing, his country would be greatly the gainer by it; but the stern necessity which binds, and often controls the destiny of the sons of song, makes him the supervisor of the works of others, and editor of many compilations, when he should be devoted to the offspring of his own genius. He is yet young for one of so ripe a fame; and much is to be hoped from him in time to come. He is so mild, so gentle, and has so little of envy in his nature, that those who know him, love him; and he has seldom, (a rare occurrence) found even an enemy to his muse. I do not recollect a single criticism on his works that contained any acrimony.

BRYANT.—This gentleman was educated a lawyer, and has been seduced from the hard labours of the profession, by his love of letters, to become an editor of a paper, and a general writer. His poetry has been gratefully praised by those who were the best judges of literary merit. He has been more popular with scholars than with the great mass of the reading community; yet with them he holds high rank. He is natural, easy, and tasteful, and condenses his thoughts with great power over language, by having clear views of his subject. He is descriptive when his subject admits of it, but is always master of the philosophy of the theme, without which verse is nothing but a dress for moral sentiment and metaphysical reasoning.

SPRAGUE.—The muse of Charles Sprague was, like Hoole's, nurtured in a banking-house. He has long been engaged in the duties of a banker, and discharged them with the most unwearied industry and care; but these arduous labours have not repressed his warmth of zeal, or clipped the wings of his imagination. Some of his poetry is as solid and pure as the precious metals of hvaults.

DAWES.—This is quite a young man; but has written enough, that is beautiful and attractive, to place him in the constellation of poets that has lately risen to the view of the American people; a constellation that emits a mild and lovely light; but one that has shone long enough, as yet, for the observer to calculate its wide range in the heavens, or to mark the exact magnitude of the different stars that form it. Justice, in time, will be done to each and all; for the night of ignorance and superstition, in which the streaming meteor excited the wonder and astounded the gaze of nations, while the harmonious movements of the planets were but little noticed, has passed away forever, and every eye is now fixed upon the regular, the beautiful, the shining heavenly body, whether it

"Adorns the orb or ushers in the morn."

But to come down from the empyrean to which, in contemplating the subject of poetry and its authors, I am often carried; and to speak plainly of these writers, I think that they will not have occasion, in the end, to complain of the discussions of the public on their respective merits; for there is no one person, in this country, as there has been in England, at some periods in her history, who was the arbiter elegantiarum of the public, among whose judgments it were in vain to appeal.

HALLECK.—Halleck I have often before the public, in pieces of infinite wit and fancifulness. There is a flow and ease of composition, plenty in this, as in most other cases, the effect of great labour; I cannot conceive of ease being acquired in verse without, which has distinguished him among his brethren. He gathered up, or suffered somebody else, to collect a volume or two of his poems, and has not a few still floating in journals of the day. His playful scraps are not inferior to Moore's, which have lately been collected by his poetical friends. I name this to show how difficult it is to succeed in wit and satire, especially if it assumes a playful manner. He gave rebuke easily, but the ironical smile is of difficult attainment. It is a powerful and dangerous weapon, and ought to be freely used when the possessor is unconscious of its effects; but I do not know that Mr. Halleck has used it by any lawful subjects, and in a gentlemanly manner. It is at the Percys was a fair one.

SANDS.—Sands is a poet of most exquisite taste. He wrote in connexion with his friend Eastburn that beautiful Indian tale Yamyoyden. It is a specimen of poetry. Mr. Sands is now quite devoted to it, in some shape or other. His productions often adorn the annuals printed in this country, such as the Talisman, Sair, &c. Whatever comes from his pen has the marks of taste and taste about it. He is now engaged in a biographical work of some importance, which will, no doubt, receive the notice it demands from his pen.

Yamyoyden is a poem which has been admired by the lettered and tasteful, but has not yet floated into that popular current of distinction which it will inevitably, sooner or later find. Mr. Sands is a ripe scholar, familiar with all the best specimens of ancient and modern poetry, and if his muse has a fault, it is that of being too fastidious and severe in her corrections of her own inspirations; but this is so rare a fault in this country, where it must be confessed, you may find more genius than taste, that it should be forgiven for its singularity.

There are many American artists who are rapidly rising in the public estimation. Among the few noticed in the work before us, we select several at random.

DUNLAP.—Dunlap has been distinguished as an author, as well as a painter. He has figured in biography as well as in the drama. He was admired among the scholars of an age gone by, and is honoured by the present, as a man of genius and of taste, and it is no easy matter to keep up with the march of improvement at this time. He has reared a monument to Brown the novelist, to Cooke the tragedian, and to others of less note. May he be rewarded according to his deeds.

WIER.—B. W. Wier is an historical painter, he spent some time in Italy in pursuit of his art, with a most perfect devotion to it. He is delicate and elaborate in his finishings, and every thing from his pencil shows that with the elements of a great painter, he has the industry that ensures success. In colouring, he imitates the Venetian masters, and the effect is often delightful. He is yet young, and the country has much to expect from him.

INGHAM.—C. Ingham is a portrait and historical painter; he has made many fine portraits for the exhibition room. His colouring is admirable, his finishing finely minute. His female heads of taste and fashion, in high dress, have been the admiration of men of judgment, not only in this city, but in other cities, where they could not have been influenced by the social and virtuous qualities of the individual. The talents of the artist could alone have been the foundation of their opinions.

CUMMINGS.—T. C. Cummings is a miniature painter, and possesses a good share of capacity in his line; and it is a branch of difficult attainment. His sketches are full of life—mind and spirit seem to awake in his most shadowy lines.

INMAN.—H. Inman, a portrait and historical painter, is a great favourite in New-York. He is not more than twenty-four or five years old, and yet he has attained to an honourable eminence in his profession. His compositions are bold in design, and happy in effect. He never seems to think of a difficulty in his art, and seldom does he meet one. His colouring is remarkably fine, and all speak of him as full of still greater promise, while they are admiring what he has already done. This is unforced praise from them, for he has no management in eliciting admiration and praise; it comes from his labours alone.

DURAND.—A. B. Durand is a landscape painter, and would be very clever in this branch if his pre-eminent talents as an engraver did not put him, as a painter, in the back ground. His productions are in every work of standard taste and talents published in this country. I have many of his works in my mind which are exquisite, but as they are not before me, I shall refrain from my criticisms for fear of not doing justice to his merits.

BENNET.—Bennet is one of this gifted society, and uses his pencil or his graver as occasion requires with ease and talent.

We conclude our extracts with the following graphic sketch of Dr. Mitchell.

DR. MITCHELL.—In one of the rooms of the Lyceum are several large cases, marked with the name of Doctor Samuel L. Mitchell, which is as familiar to you on the other side of the Atlantic as with us, on this; for he has received academic honours from every literary and scientific institution, I believe, of note in the world; and the doctor himself is less understood than any other man living. Some have laughed at him as a credulous, rhapsodical lover of learning, but without much true science, and entirely destitute of judgment and common sense. Others, and particularly those in foreign countries, hail him as the most learned man in America; for they have received more information from him than from others, and it is natural they should suppose that he was truly at the head of our savans and literati. The doctor has analysed every thing which has been brought forward for nearly half a century past, in matter and mind; and he cannot complain if he should now be analyzed himself. In that part of his character which assures a man true respect and affection from those around him, a kind disposition and a benevolent heart, and a life of charitable deeds, the doctor has nothing to fear from any scrutiny. But to commence as the moral anatomist, upon his capacities, powers and organizations, it may be said that his memory is wonderful, and he has stored up an immense accumulation of facts in every art and science, and every incident in history; not contented with this, he never suffers a fact, or circumstance, which he has taken pains to treasure in his memory, to be there alone; but he makes a minute of it on paper, and puts that in a pigeon-hole, to answer as a voucher to his memory, if that should fail him, or be doubted by himself or others. From these methods he has obtained advantages over most men, in fact, I might say, over any one I ever knew. He has not only been industrious in this accumulation of valuable materials, but his mind has been active in reasoning upon them. He is happy in great quickness of perception, and falls more naturally into a train of correct reasoning, than those who labour ever so hard for it. He describes with great ease, and often most felicitously. If his style is sometimes tainted with a little vanity, it bears no marks of arrogance. It is true that he never fears to meet a subject, however novel, and it is true, that he seldom touches one without giving it some new grace or ornament. He is equally happy in giving names as characteristics. A monster of the ocean unknown, and of course unnamed by ancients or moderns, some ten years ago was caught in our waters; the doctor saw, dissected it, and named it "the Vampire of the ocean;" and I challenge the lovers of Buffon to produce a more accurate, lively, and philosophical description in all that admired author's works, than was given of this anomaly. The doctor is called credulous; indeed he is; but his is not the credulity of wondering ignorance, that knowing nothing, believes every thing; whose imagination makes hobgoblins and "chimeras dire;" and fears the powers of fiends, because he knows nothing of angelic natures. The doctor's credulity, in all the wonders of creation, is like that charged by the noble Festus upon Paul—"much learning makes thee mad;" by which madness was meant an unbounded credulity in believing a newly promulgated religion, which was to the wise a stumbling block and to the Greeks foolishness. The doctor's credulity arose from knowing more than other men. He was acquainted with the laws of nature, and knew not where to fix her bounds. He saw that she was carrying on innumerable processes, in an immense laboratory, and could not say what she might not produce next. If he who knows but little is credulous, he who knows much is more so. About forty years since, a wise father, whose son had been in India, heard his accounts of certain religionists of that country, suspending themselves with hooks thrust through the flesh or the ribs, and swinging for hours in the air, "My dear son, I believe your narrative fully, because you have been taught to tell the truth; but do not repeat the story, for others will not believe you; it is too much for them to credit; wait a while, and others will tell the tale, and you may confirm it; I will assure you it is dangerous to be a discoverer;" and the friends of Fulton begged of him not to persist in his speculations on the use of steam engines. Such credulity as Dr. Mitchell possesses, has been the promoter of all that is useful in the arts and sciences. Tecumseh said to an Indian agent, "You tell me that you know how many steps it is round this earth, and you never crossed the mountains! Tell me who is the mother of all the rivers; how deep is the sea; and when the sun will grow old, and die, like my forefathers; I will then believe that you can tell me how long my arms must be to embrace my mother earth." The agent replied, "I can tell you when your moon shall hide her head, and become dark; and you will see the darkness come on; and all your tribes shall see it also." The wondering savage seized the thought, and bought the secret; foretold the eclipse to his followers; this increased their confidence in him; the eclipse happened; his fame was established; and he threatened the agent and astronomer, from whom he obtained the secret, with death, if he was not out of his reach forthwith. The moral is at hand; many a one has availed himself of the doctor's information, calculations, and conjectures, and tried to hide his own ignorance in abusing the source from whence his knowledge flowed. There is a vanity, however, in human nature, which the good doctor has a share of; that is, a desire of having a reputation for knowing almost all things; yet it must be confessed, that the doctor's manner is modest enough.

The doctor has been charged with enthusiasm. He is enthusiastic; but it is that ardour of mind that wishes to raise the standard of knowledge above what it is in this country, which is, indeed, a pardonable enthusiasm. Nothing good or great was ever achieved without it. It is the "divine inspiration" which swells the bosoms of the gods of knowledge, when they labour for the sons of men.

The doctor is not only credulous, inquisitive, enthusiastic, but ambitious. He wishes this country to be the first on earth, and himself the first man in the country. This is fair.

and if he fails in either, after having made the struggle to bring about his wishes, who will say that the attempt was not a noble one? Give us more such ambitious men as Sir Humphrey Davy, such credulous ones as Columbus and Fulton, and you may cover them with the names of enthusiasts, dupes, insane men, and every other epithet that ignorance and dulness can pick up, or mouth, after some disappointed rival has once spoken it.

There is another sin the doctor has long been guilty of; and that is, the sin of perseverance in attempting to enlighten mankind, after sciolists and fops have satirized him for attempting to make them wise. This is a "grievous offence," and one that can never be forgiven, while envy has so much sway among men.

If any one denies the doctor taste and science, let him go and view his cabinet of curiosities, and see the order and beauty of his arrangement. Every thing in its place, from the butterfly and humming-bird, caught on the summer flower, to the tooth of the mastodon, the horns of the elk, and the brick, coming all the way from Babylon, to the meteoric stone coming from heaven knows where, and then ask him if there is not taste, science, skill, patience, and much that should make a great philosopher in Dr. Mitchell's cabinet.

American Anecdotes. Original and Select. By an American. Boston: Putnam & Hunt, 1830.

We have just received the first volume of this work. It is a large duodecimo, containing about three hundred pages, printed on fine paper, with a clear impression, and forms a very fair specimen of typography. The remaining volume is yet in press, but is soon to be published. Though most of the anecdotes were familiar to us, yet the repurcell has afforded us no little amusement, and the editor has our best wishes for the success of his undertaking. He merits the thanks of his countrymen for having snatched so many honourable memorials of their ancestors from the perishable records of a newspaper column, and presented them in so agreeable and enduring a form. But we cannot better notice his labours than by the use of his own words:

"It is believed, that this collection of anecdotes will be found peculiarly interesting, as many of them relate to that portion of American history, and to those distinguished men for ever dear to the virtuous and patriotic bosom. Whatever tends to illustrate the principles, and to display the characters of those who achieved our revolution, will be read with pleasure, as long as the love of country shall animate the breast.

"The editor has employed the leisure hours of an active life in collecting what he has here thrown together. It has been his aim to combine instruction with amusement; nothing has been admitted into the work calculated to create a feeling of irreverence for any of the social or christian sympathies of our nature, and although the compiler lays no claim to originality of diction, care has been taken to suit the language, as well as the sentiments, to the most fastidious taste."

Paul Clifford. By the author of Pelham, the Disowned, and Devereux. Two vols. 12mo. New-York: J. & J. Harper. 1830.

We copy a notice of this "Pelham novel" from the racy pen of that distinguished scholar the editor of the National Gazette. We are induced to this by the consideration that the indiscriminating praise with which the productions of Bulwer have been noticed, even by one of our own correspondents, may receive some check—their tendency being, upon weak minds, precisely such as is ably pointed out by the Philadelphia critic.

"We have found leisure to read with attention the new Pelham novel, as it is called, (Paul Clifford) and we did the same with Godwin's Cloudesley. The impression left is that of a sacrifice of time by the perusal—but the celebrity of authors forms a temptation, and with journalists, creates almost a necessity to become acquainted with their fresh productions. The week before the last we caused a chapter of Cloudesley to be copied—the best, we think, of the work—in regard to which we may say, generally, that it is trite in its story—that it might be reduced to one-half its size with advantage, owing to great diffusion of style and repetition of thought; but that it contains eloquent passages, some striking and just views of human nature, vigorous and nice delineations of character, and cogent moral lessons.

"This morning we furnish a chapter from Paul Clifford, a lively, graphic narrative of a road robbery, which is a proper illustration of the cast of the book. The hero of this technical tale of roguery, or strange political allegory, is a gifted, magnanimous, daring, philosophical, sentimental, love-sick, fortunate highwayman, a predatory Apollo, who wins the heart and finally the hand and fortune, of a high-born, beautiful, delicate, refined, exquisite, country heiress. His gang are meant to represent members of the present British cabinet, and several of the most famous legal, political, or patrician characters; and their jolly patron and landlord shadows out no less a personage than King George IV. The work is a curious medley, replete with satirical allusions and comments, which few American readers will at once comprehend. It has peculiar merits and faults, but we should not readily discover in it the hand of the author of Devereux. The scenes and the dialogues of the greater part of the two volumes are those of low and criminal life; the language requires a glossary, like Grose's Classical Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue, a collection of slang phrases, otherwise, Tyburn flash or cant, or St. Giles's Greek. The thieves, house-breakers, pick-pockets, and tipping landladies, utter coarse jokes and paltry puns without number; their diction and actions are characteristic, while they descant upon the vices of government and rulers, and the perversions and oppressions of the social system. There is much radical declamation and discontent; human nature and condition are almost universally exhibited in the most odious light; the villains of the patrician order are monsters; the "common cursitors," or vagabonds and trulls, have their redeeming virtues and blandishments: the comrades of the Apollo shine like Macheaths, Wilds, and Robin Hood.

"As far as moral or immoral design can be imputed to the author, we should infer that he meant to vilify all political and social institutions, and mankind and womankind; and to compound a book which should, as Schiller's play is said to have done, multiply the race of public robbers, and cause young ladies to long after them for lovers and husbands. It cannot be denied that he has pursued these ends with a certain ability, and in a way fitted to awaken more or less interest in his pages; but, nevertheless, he has introduced so much hyperbole, caricature, ribaldry, wild and improbable fiction, mawkish sentimentality, horrid guilt, spurious philosophy—that a reader who reflects and analyzes, may be surprised at the lavish and broad panegyric which has been bestowed on the farrago. Doubtless, Paul Clifford is not without occasional eloquence, deep or plausible satire, and descriptive or imaginative power, so styled, in several of the chapters; in conceding, however, such merits, we must state formally the opinion couched in our antecedent remarks—that it is a secondary performance, of bad tendencies, which, we trust, will not be imitated either by Mr. Bulwer himself, or the servile pecus. We have not room for an abstract of his extravagant plot, ending with the flight of the convict hero and the devoted inamorata to these United States, where they spend the remainder of their days in the utmost honour and felicity. We think that the British nobles, including the royal family, must now take the alarm when they see themselves drawn, in the popular novels, in the guise of plunderers and blackguards, adepts and models of the Flash Academy. This liberty or licence is carried further in Paul Clifford than in any book of similar nature and repute which has ever fallen into our hands. The ministers and the judges may tremble the more, when they advert to the measure in which romances and tales have supplanted all other literary productions, to the extent in which the manufacture is diffused and the avidity with which it is sought. On this important head there are pertinent suggestions in the dedicatory epistle of the renowned E. L. B., who well understands his game."

Camden, a Tale of the South. Two vols. 12mo. Philadelphia: Carey & Lea. 1830.

The author of this story, connected with events of the revolutionary war occurring in South Carolina, and with Gates' defeat by Cornwallis, has wisely foreseen that it was hopeless for him to supersede Cooper in national tales. The very mention of the successful novelist's name, in his lame and halting preface, is calculated to ensure his work a very indifferent reception. One fault must be pointed out which stares the reader in every page, and is altogether unpardonable, the reiteration of the most profane curses, and shameful violation of the third commandment.

Death of Ugolina, a Tragedy. By W Featherstonhaugh. Philadelphia: Carey and Lea. 1830.

Mr. F. should have remained satisfied with the laurels he won by his accurate and spirited translation of Cicero. As a writer of tragedies, we fear he is doomed to no very enviable fame. Mr. F. has mistaken measured prose, however bombastic and fustian-like, for the dignity of verse—and this is all sufficient, to enumerate no other fault, to render his attempt abortive.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

End of the volume.—The present number completes the seventh volume of the New-York Mirror. If during the period of our editorial existence our trials have been numerous and vexatious, our labours unceasing, and frequently obnoxious to the most wilful misrepresentation; if pompous vanity and conceited affectation have sometimes sneered upon our efforts, and attempted to rob our industry of its fair reward; if envy, jealousy, and malice have frequently assailed us in our progress, and sought to dampen our zeal by enshrouding us in the dark gloom of their shadow; if we have been beset by difficulties and anxieties which only perseverance the most indefatigable could have overcome—we are, nevertheless, proud at the close of our probation thus far, that success not often experienced in the history of periodicals in this country, has slowly, but surely waited upon our footsteps, and is now secured to us by the liberal, continued, and substantial patronage of an enlightened community. Animated by the fair prospect which opens to our anticipations, we shall go on as we have begun, untiring in our exertions to render this miscellany a useful, instructive, diversified, and entertaining repository of elegant literature and the arts.

Forth of July.—To-morrow's sun will smile upon the fifty-fourth anniversary of our country's independence; and grateful should all her sons be who to witness her growing prosperity and increase among the great and powerful nations of the earth. Peace on her borders; plenty within her boundless domains; health, moral improvement, civil and religious liberty and political security; intellectual activity, ceaseless and boundless—these blessings not vouchsafed to all people, and yet these do we enjoy in their utmost fulness notwithstanding the faint lamentations of factionists and dis-organizers. On the fifth—the fourth being the Sabbath—the cannon's roar and the shouts of one multitude, the peal of bells and the light of bonfires, the devout man's prayer and the innocent child's hilarity, will attest to the glorious reality. And shall we, led away by a superficial and cold philosophy, desire to put a stop to expression of such rejoicings, to the celebration, in such these outward exhibitions of gladness, of the proudest day on the calendars of human history? Shall we join with the ascetic who advise the ordinary occupations of life to be continued, and trust for the only necessary sensation only on such an occasion, to the inward operations of the mind? Such a method might answer well in the inhabitants of other planets than this, who are pure abstractions of intellect, without feeling, passion, or imagination. Man, who fortunately or unfortunately, has these qualities of action and action; these living impulses which require outward demonstrations and embodyings for the exercise of his fit. Remove these from him, and he becomes a lifeless clod capable of a magnanimous, or generous, or patriotic. But, it is asked, is it necessary for an enlightened citizen free America to become intoxicated at the booths, to waste money, and to shout himself hoarse in order that he may evince to the world that he duly appreciates the blessings he enjoys? Such are the silly extremes to which those who would abolish all festivity on the fourth of July areduced, and to which all radical reformers must be reduced who would mould man anew in their own plastic conceits, give him a nature most akin to their own. We do not add excesses at any time, least of all on the day sacred to the collection of the glorious event which made us what we are, independent, moral, and enlightened; sacred, too, to the hallowed memory of those illustrious patriots, who, by their glory of mind and bravery of heart, had the firmness to assert rights of man against his proud oppressors; and, having asserted them, dared to undergo labour and privation, reproach and contumely, sacrifice of blood, of wealth, of all that dear to them on earth, that they might secure their posterity to us. They celebrated the success and triumph of their country, and no disgrace marked their festivals. Would it ours? It does not. It is not the conduct of a dozen vagabonds who wallow in the mire of debauch and only render themselves more conspicuous on any occasion, that is to represent the behaviour, moral and virtuous, and proverbially grave, even in the hour of rejoicing of the American nation. The very charge is absurd, and is made to swell out an annual paragraph for finical moralists.

Subscribers can have their names bound by sending the numbers to this office.

All indebted to this establishment are expected to settle their accounts on receipt of this paper.

CONTENTS OF VOLUME SEVEN.

EMBELLISHMENTS.

No. I. p. 1.—No. II. p. 2.—No. III. p. 225.—
No. IV. p. 288.—No. V. p. 363.

PROSE.

Arts and Sciences 3, 11, 18, 30, 38, 43, 59, 67,
73, 142, 198, 235, 246, 261, 283, 275, 287, 291,
302, 315, 339, 347, 387, 395, 406

A Persian tale.....	1
A new melo-drama.....	39
American painters.....	60
American rustic hospitality.....	61
American scenery. Niagara.....	70
Autography.....	75
Association.....	101
Aphorisms from Devereux.....	111
An amateur play.....	115
A tale of good society.....	121
A night on the banks of the Tennessee.....	129, 137
A sketch from life.....	141
A sketch.....	145
A quandary.....	155
A romantic passion for danger.....	176
A quarter of an hour too soon.....	177, 185, 193
A lady's dream.....	201
A modern blue-beard.....	203
A Swiss legend.....	217
A walk in Broadway.....	228
An hour at the reading-room.....	236
A mysterious marriage.....	240
Accident to Major Snow.....	246
Anacreon Moore.....	250
An evening at the theatre.....	252
American navy.....	261
An unfortunate soldier.....	270
Advancement of the west.....	271
A disappointed bride.....	272
Anecdote of a sleep walker.....	275
Aurora borealis in Norway.....	275
A chapter from a manuscript work.....	277
A disappointed lover.....	282
A man with one idea.....	285
An old man's story.....	290
A chapter on advertisements.....	294
Ancient musical arrangements.....	296
A panther hunt.....	318
April.....	326
A Spanish tale.....	329, 337, 345
Albums.....	340
A strange story.....	342
Advantages and disadvantages of genius.....	355
A Connecticut pedler.....	380
A sketch.....	401
Beauty.....	60
Bearded traveller, the.....	61
Beauty and genius.....	90
Belshazzar's feast.....	111
Buckingham palace.....	131
Bulwer and Walter Scott.....	132
Bridal retort.....	227
Biographical sketch of Mrs. Mary E. Brooks.....	229
Bad habits.....	250
Biography of Jacob Hays.....	260
Bad company.....	323
Boy-men and girl-women.....	496
Chinese manners.....	38
Cause of leanness.....	66
Confessions of a disliked man.....	68
Conjugal excellence.....	74
Curious extracts from curious authors, for curious readers.....	75
Cacochres scribendi.....	105
Crowding.....	118
Constantinople.....	119
Charles Maria Von Weber.....	149
Choice of occupation.....	187
Christmas.....	200
Campbell and Shakspeare.....	245
Climate.....	246
Chilling politeness.....	253
Constancy. A fable.....	254
Changes of manners.....	262
Comforts and cares.....	263
Confessions of an imaginative man.....	266
Carriage riding.....	274
Common sense.....	301
Confessions of a suspicious gentleman.....	305, 313
Court and camp of Buonaparte.....	312
Cicero's family seat.....	328
Clothing of children.....	342
Cause of insanity.....	342
Chapter on eulogies.....	346
Charles Carroll.....	378
Character of a well-bred man.....	399
Description of the tower of London.....	38
Dean Swift.....	61
Destiny. A traveller's story.....	85, 93
Drama, the, 87, 91, 110, 126, 147, 191, 219, 232, 217, 267, 278, 286, 290, 307, 331, 339, 355, 375, 390, 407.....	131
Dr. Arne.....	150
Uying a-la-mode.....	225
Description of the bowling green.....	263
Decision of a libel case.....	263

Editorial—True Charity, The Newspaper Press, Gold, American Argus, Clinton-hall, Interesting to Play-wrights, 7—Musical Taste, Early Rising, The weekly papers of this city, Prince's Linnæan Garden, Tight Lacing, William Coleman, John- son Verplanck, 15—Pure Water, Typography, Castle Garden, Medical Society of New-York, 23 —Editorial Personalities, Tight Lacing, Theatrical Portraits, Shaking Quakers, Competition, 31 —Hoboken, City of Troy, Death of Charles Gil- fert, A beautiful inscription, 39—Reforms in Turkey, Silent Auctioneers, Fulton-street Ferry, 47—Hoboken, Edward Lytton Bulwer, Infidelity, The Southern Literary Gazette, The Mercury, Lightning Rods, 55—Newspaper Poetry, Hindoo Widows, Artificial Eyes, Carriers of Papers, 63— Inns of Court, Manhattan Water, 71—Theatrical Portraits, Horticultural Society, Lithography, The Arts, Tecumseh, 79—Melonga the Egg Plant, The Horn of Chase, 87—Expedition to the South Seas, Mr. Forrest, 95—City Dispensary, Miss Sedgwick, Fair at Lynchburgh, 111—Mr. Gilfert, Our poetical Correspondents, 119—Southern Polar Expedition, Fair of the American Institute, Dr. Harris, New-York Sacred Music Society, Jail and Bridewell, Sailors at the Theatre, The Park, Clin- ton Hall, Pure Water, What next? Portrait of George Fourth, Brick meeting, New Map of the United States, Brief Correspondence, 126—Mr. Forrest, Looking Ahead, Editorial Plagiarisms, The Dahlia, The Prize Tragedy, Artificial Flow- ers in Wax, 135—Hopkins Robertson, Masaniello, Fanny, 143—Union Hotel, Bridge across the East River, Liberty, Buried Alive, 151—Fortune of War, The Annuals, Polytechnic Institute, News- paper Criticism, Good Advice, 169—Editorial Prerogative, Texas, 167—High School Society of New-York, A Poetical Compliment, Miss Clara Fisher, The National Gazette, 175—Editorial Miseries, Theatrical Anecdote, 191—Association for the Relief of Females, Revised Statutes, Theatrical Benefits, Dr. Beck's Introductory Lec- ture, Fatal Effects of Passion, Miss Milford, Madame Mailbran, 199—January, The Froelyle, Clara Fisher, Independence of the Press, 207— Collegiate Institute at Brooklyn, American Insti- tute, New-Year's Day, The Truth Teller, 215— The Possessive Case, Literary Premiums, East River Bridge, 223—Absence of Mind, The Revised Statutes, The late Mr. Gilfert, 231—Correct Read- ing, Listen to Reproof, Mrs. Edward Knight, Fashionable Boots, A London Fog, 239—American Periodicals, Rev. Mr. Schroeder's Address, Even- ing Journal, A Literary Lounge, A Brave Girl, 247—Elegant Extract, Polytechnic Institute, Mas- querades, 255—Abductions, Pure Water, Mael- zel's Exhibition, Savings Bank, 263—Colonel Henry Rutgers, Nathaniel H. Carter, Literary Prizes, The Piano Forte, Fashionable Tour, Generous Act, Another Tragedy wanted, Ameri- can Statesmen, 271—Horticultural Society, New Papers, Oratorio at St. Pauls, Engraving on Wood, Peixotto's Gregory, 279—Colonel Richard Platt, Credit, United States Navy, The term Reli- gion, Miss Fanny Kemble, 287—Spring, Union of the States, 295—Eloquence of the United States, Boston Courier, Late City Improvements, Miss Elizabeth Bogart, The American Press, 303— Prince's Garden, Conjugal Affection, Singular and Plural, 311—Duels, Metamora, Bank Fail- ures, 319—Voluntary Exile, Historical Painting, 327—Association to aid Industrious Females, Birth Place of Columbus, 335—Maternal Influ- ence and Responsibility, Editorial Quarrels, Brooklyn Collegiate Institute, May-day, 343— Education, Female Wages, Steam-boats, The Harpers, Ourselves, Mrs. Sharpe, Mr. Forrest, 361—Columbia College Alumni, House of Indus- try, Biographical Mania, 369—Newspapers, Bene- volent and Religious Societies, Steam-boat Com- petition, 367—Water, The Fulton Box, 375—The Mirror, Greece, Infant Schools, House of Indus- try, Fulton-box, 383—Byron, Moore, and Lady Byron: Ladies on Horseback, Franklin Buildings, Miss Sterling, Holland's Cottage, 391—Music, 399 Vermont Classical Seminary, Female Wages, Water, Manhattan Gas-Light Company, 307— Fourth of July, Niblo's Garden, 414	57
Elopement, the.....	57
Easy writing and light reading.....	66
English scenery and villages.....	100
Exercise.....	139
Emperor Nicholas.....	141
Evils of early rising.....	207
Emilie.....	212
Extract from a journal.....	236
Effects of warmth on animal life.....	246
Early impressions.....	261
Effects of charcoal.....	282
Effects of fright.....	283
English female equestrians.....	302
Eloquent Americans.....	304
Editorial courtesies.....	324

Eating.....	388
Extract from a log-book.....	398
Fine arts.....	291, 307, 359
Fashion.....	78
Fall of the Roman empire.....	140
Faith and good works.....	176
Friendship of woman.....	203
Forethought in courtship.....	211
Foscara, the patrician of Venice.....	219
Friday.....	227
Freedom of the press.....	238
Founders of the republic.....	253
Female authors.....	261
Female courage and fortitude.....	261
Facilities in travelling.....	296
Females of Africa.....	319
Female beauty.....	319
From my scrap-book.....	336
Founding of Nuremberg.....	379
Foreshortening.....	379
Goethe.....	150
Glances into the East.....	184
Going to market.....	189
Grecian literature.....	190
Gretina-green.....	333
Government of the tongue.....	406
Height of impudence.....	85
How to stop a runaway horse.....	119
Homer and his nation.....	158
Herculeanum and Pompeii.....	176
History and antiquity of the well.....	198
Herculaneum.....	255
Hints to Janus.....	274
Hypochondria.....	276
Hereditary descent of mental talent.....	283
Horticulture.....	318
Honour.....	318
Habits of sheep.....	390
Hints to mothers.....	390
Indian queen and her daughter.....	41, 49
Ignis Fatuus.....	64
Indian revenge.....	97
It is none of your business.....	110
I am engaged.....	192
Informal divorces.....	222
Irish anecdote.....	237
Italian character.....	262
Indian eloquence.....	262
Invention of the Cherokee alphabet.....	269
Idle people.....	284
Imitation.....	322
Indian character.....	336
John Bull's gullibility.....	312
Joseph Buonaparte.....	379
Jonathan's watch trade.....	399
Keats, the English poet.....	60
Kosciusko.....	197
Kemble and Watson.....	320
Literary Notices—Stratton Hill, Stories for Youth, Hungarian Tales, 6—London Edition of the Wa- verley novels, Richelieu, Court Journal, School of Fashion, 14—The Yankee, Second Notice of Hun- garian Tales, 22—American Edition of the Wa- verley novels, Barnard's Narrative, 31—Richelieu, a tale of France, 39—The School of Fashion, The Silk-worm and Mulberry Tree, Devereux, 47— Gabel Tier, Captain Hall's Travels, 64—Captain Hall, second notice, The Yankee, 62—Devereux, second notice, Tales of Humour and Romance, The Willis's Magazine, New French Primer, The Little Grammarian, 71—The Token for 1830, 53— The Talisman, 94—Peace Campaigns of a Cornet, Atlantic Souvenir, The New Forest, 99—Periodical Literature, Medical and Physical Journal, Vision of Cortes, 112—Bybrent de Cruce, 127—Foreign Quarterly Review, Journal of Health, 134—Book of the Boudoir, 143—Familiar Lectures on Botany, Adventures of a King's Page, 158—Memoirs of the Rev. John Summerfield, The Poor, Monu- mental Structures, 183—Moore's Life of Byron, The Daily Sentinel, New-York Medical Inq'r, 4r, William's Annual Register, 223—Foreign Publi- cations, 235—The Waverley Novels, 240—Ency- clopedia Americana, Journal of a Residence in London, 243—Waverley novels, American Comic Annual, Jefferson's Works, 250—Darnley, 275— The Gold-headed Cane, 294—Moore's Life of By- ron, 295—Hooper's Medical Dictionary, Sketches of a Traveller, Foreign Literature, 299—The Fa- mily Library, 307—Life of Paul Jones, 311—Web- ster's Abridged Dictionary, 319—Lawrie Todd, Paul Clifford, The Lost Heir, 331—Visit to Greece and Constantinople, North American Review, 346—Walter Scott's History of Scotland, Captain Hall in America, Crabbe's English Synonyms, 363—Posthumous Works of Junius, Encyclopæ- dia Americana, Lockhart's History of Napoleon, 371—Lexington and other poems, Tales and Sketches, Dr. Peixotto's Discourse, 357—Clarence, The Valley of the Nashaway, Paul Clifford, Sto- ries of a Bride, Ralph Marvyn, 394—Chronicles of the City of Gotham, Sketches of Public Cha- racters, 403	4, 20, 52
Letters from Europe.....	4, 20, 52
Letter from the country.....	13

Language of the flowers.....	19, 27, 35
Little Pickle in France.....	39
Letter of advice from a father to his only daughter.....	61
London streets.....	74
Little Genius, the 92, 108, 116, 148, 156, 164, 172, 180, 188, 196, 204, 228, 316, 356, 361, 404.....	109
Life of Sir Humphrey Davy.....	117
Letters from Constantinople.....	131
Love at a glimpse.....	139
Laughing.....	182
Legal fictions.....	182
Letters from Josephine to Napoleon.....	214
Letter writing.....	238
Letter from Louis XVIII to Napoleon.....	253
La Fayette.....	253
Love of change—house hunting.....	342
Locking the door during dinner.....	361
Letitia Elizabeth Landon.....	393
Love and pistols.....	26, 45
Mythology.....	38
Monsters not mentioned by Linneus.....	58
Modern female attire.....	119
Miseries of a shopkeeper.....	124
Match breaking.....	125, 134
My aunt's poodle.....	128
My new coat.....	149
Mozart.....	165
Melancholy.....	189
Mutability of human affairs.....	195
Music and painting.....	241
Miss Lucretia Maria Davidson.....	246
Magisterial interference.....	257
Maiden tribute.....	265
Mysterious wedding. A Danish story.....	283
Mistaken views of religion.....	322
Moving panorama.....	341
Mrs. Elizabeth Hill.....	360
May-day in New-York.....	358
Mr. Vanderlyn's pamphlet.....	363
Mr. Sarah Hall.....	364
Morality—horse-racing.....	366, 374
Metaphysics of music.....	374
Mutations of fashion.....	378
Mrs. Garrick.....	390
Mrs. Henry Siddons.....	404
Madness.....	412
Men of genius.....	22
Napoleon's passage over the Alps.....	22
Nothing at all.....	139
Nature.....	223
New journals.....	238
Napoleon and Isabeau.....	325
Nature.....	378
Napoleon Buonaparte.....	378
Nuisances not indictable at law.....	381
Our interest.....	23
Oregon territory.....	153
Our children.....	176
Old English comedies.....	181
Origin of Grecian literature.....	270
Old customs.....	300
Oysters.....	300
Porriatic, the 4, 12, 20, 29, 36, 44, 52, 60, 68, 76, 84.....	6
Prejudice.....	36
Prudence.....	41
Particular people.....	51
Present sultan.....	59
Painter's chamber at Florence.....	90
Public buildings.....	169
Preparations for pleasure. A pic-nic.....	192
Perseverance under difficulties.....	202
Pearl fishery.....	211
Periodicals and newspapers.....	211
Persian method of destroying tigers.....	220
Painting.....	238
Physical education.....	246
Political parrots.....	246
Phenomena of light.....	271
Precedency.....	283
Prediction verified.....	292
Prize tragedies.....	296
Progress of improvement.....	310
Painters, sculptors, and architects.....	342
Portrait of a voluptuary in France.....	357
Philadelphia—New-York—Boston.....	406
Pad-gaud.....	28
Rival belles, the.....	84
Reminiscences of China.....	110
Respect to age.....	146
Rules for preserving the sight.....	227
Revolutionary recollections.....	255
Red Jacket.....	270
Riding on horseback.....	293
Ramon, the rover of Cuba.....	261
Rational poets.....	334
Russian high life.....	373
Review of Lord Byron's first productions.....	385
Rival mothers.....	399
Riding.....	399
Robert Owen in England.....	3
Statistics of Paris.....	3
Science in France.....	46
Sweep's holiday.....	46

CONTENTS OF VOLUME SEVEN.

Second thoughts are best.....	46	The smiles and tears of April.....	343	It was a morn of summer time.....	59	Thou melancholy star.....	217
Singular friendship.....	50	The poet's supper.....	349	I come, I come! There's a sound of joy.....	63	There is a transport of the soul.....	217
Stand from under.....	51	Tobacco.....	372	I speak not, I trace not.....	75	There is a leaf whose life is fed.....	227
Summer.....	58	The ocean.....	380	It was a sunny day—the sportive winds.....	81	The blushing morn with roses veiled.....	231
Stilesian girl, the.....	77	The black-moss.....	389, 396	It was an autumn evening tide.....	113	There's ne'er a flower that lifts its head.....	233
Specimen of a Chinese drama.....	91	Turkish stratagem.....	398	It was not beauty's outward mien.....	129	Thou of the free and radiant smile.....	241
Sicilian character.....	187	The neglected wife.....	409	I had a dream—a sunny dream.....	161	The world of dreams—the world of dreams.....	241
Sensibility of genius.....	192	Umbrella fiend.....	360	I never was a favourite.....	216	The curtain's down, and while they're all behind.....	251
Sicilian nobility.....	192	Use of letters.....	176	I've sat and seen one bright wave chase.....	216	There came a moan.....	265
Sea-sickness.....	222	Varities 8, 16, 24, 32, 40, 56, 84, 72, 80, 96, 104, 112, 120, 128, 136, 144, 152, 160, 168, 176, 184, 192, 200, 208, 211, 248, 264, 272, 280, 283, 288, 296, 299, 312, 320, 323, 360, 368, 376, 381, 392, 400, 408		I looked on the face of the summer-deck'd earth.....	225	There was a fearful gathering seen.....	270
Satire on emigration.....	237	Visit to a gipsy tribe.....	155	I cannot love her—every tress.....	233	The muse and myself, the other day.....	307
Southey.....	239	Washington.....	46	If heaven to one of mortal kind.....	241	The winds of March are humming.....	310
Sir Walter Scott.....	239	Water pink, the.....	208	I loved thee for thyself alone.....	263	The sun had sunk in darkness to his sleep.....	313
Steam.....	244	Whiskers.....	218	It is in thought with reverend bards to thread.....	281	The poet seized his new-made pen.....	321
Sonnets of Shakspeare.....	245	Whiskerados confederation.....	221	I've known a fairer form than hers.....	297	The knight had returned from Palestine.....	329
Scottish editors.....	246	Walking.....	221	I saw thee in thy life's young spring.....	297	There is not a flower that blooms in the valley.....	334
Sensation.....	254	West India ladies.....	239	I met a man in Regent-street.....	368	The day is set—the ladies met.....	335
Sessions hall.....	259	Well-street, between the hours of one and three.....	348	In the halls where the young smile of beauty.....	377	There is a tone of anguish.....	345
Singular escape.....	271	Washington Irving.....	348	I saw her when the earnest glow.....	386	The city's doors were opened. Forth there came.....	353
Standard of the Janisaries.....	280	Wife of Governor Houston.....	382	Knight! to the conflict—on.....	129	Tell me, gentle zephyr, tell.....	369
Spring.....	317	Zoological weather glass.....	198	Lift the flag on mount and billow.....	33	The curtain drops—the mimic scene is past.....	390
Singular circumstance.....	335	POETRY.....		Lady, I've looked upon thy face.....	99	Thou hast past with all thy gifts away.....	393
Spanish armada.....	335	Away—away—thou glittering thing.....	17	Love knocked at the door of my heart one day.....	33	Though milder skies allure thee hence.....	409
Singing conducive to health.....	379	And art thou sorrowful, beloved.....	89	Land of the pencil and the lyre.....	225	Vain the waters roll between us.....	225
Sir Thomas Lawrence and Miss Siddons.....	379	Afar, afar o'er the dark blue tide.....	89	Love is heaven's attribute, therefore to heaven.....	355	Where should the vows of youthful love.....	33
Superstition and cruelty.....	379	Again fair spring has twin'd her fragrant wreaths.....	97	Listen, gentle lady, listen.....	35	What gaze ye look me sair, lassie.....	43
Sketches of John Randolph.....	251, 280	And must the young and beautiful depart.....	161	Mother of light and beauty, hear my prayer.....	99	Waken, lords and ladies gay.....	49
John Galt.....	258	As we look back through life.....	216	Morning is beaming o'er brake and bower.....	43	Why am I doomed the pang to prove.....	50
Frederick Schiller.....	266	A strange dull weight is on my heart.....	224	My heart is with thee, Bulwer.....	65	We parted—friendship's dream had cast.....	106
Sir Francis Burdett.....	284	And wilt thou fly with me, sweet maid.....	241	Mary, my romance is over.....	99	Whither wend'st thou, mystic power.....	153
Prince Hohenzollern.....	294	And wherefore should I linger here.....	249	My love is young and fair.....	129	Who seeks for spots in Sol must gaze.....	325
Mrs. Siddons.....	300	Ambition rules his soul.....	246	My little girl, the other day.....	144	Winter, time of frosty breathing.....	356
Antonio Canova.....	317	Art thou the spell we cling to, thou.....	273	My heart in long repose has slumbered.....	217	Wake, idol of my faded years.....	289
Robert Bloomfield.....	332	"A broken heart!" 'Tis a hacknied theme.....	273	Mid the waves of the west.....	281	Wherefore, little fluttering thing.....	329
Francis Jeffrey.....	340	A bachelor, cuplens ducere sponsam.....	289	Man is a vision that fades away.....	344	When morning looked along the golden east.....	329
William Sharp.....	348	Again, my muse, awake.....	305	Music thy spell is thrown.....	393	Welcome first bird of spring.....	329
Benjamin West.....	367	Ask of the wasting heart that lives.....	313	No cloud displays its fairy sail.....	145	When the red star shall gleam on the waters.....	344
Reginald Heber.....	364	And thou the beautiful, alas, art gone.....	345	No, love, they never mention thee.....	161	When through this weary waste we stray.....	344
Sir Humphrey Davy.....	372	As! this is a time to be cloudy and sad.....	345	No more the feigned speech, or smile of art.....	175	Wake! for the morning's purple fold.....	353
Sir James Mackintosh.....	380	A freshness has gone from the field.....	377	Not from the records of imperial Rome.....	191	While others sing of wars alarms.....	361
Sir William Herschell.....	388	A worthy young lover once.....	388	No morning ever seem'd so long.....	275	When Eve brought wo to all mankind.....	368
Giovanni Belzoni.....	396	And doest thou then request a lay.....	409	Name me my first—it is ever near.....	328	We meet in the sunshine of gladness.....	401
Kean.....	404	By the silent foot of the shadowy hill.....	409	Oh, that my lot had never been to roam.....	41	You ask me, gentle maiden.....	43
Henry Kirke White.....	412	Bright shines the glorious sun.....	46	Oh, many a flower of beauty blushes.....	65	Yes, go to thy home—but it is not the hearth.....	73
Theatrical portraits 5, 13, 21, 30, 37, 45, 53, 61, 70, 76.....		Before this bar of beauty, taste, and wit.....	191	Oh, yes, 'twas a fervour of feeling.....	89	You told me once my smile had power.....	119
The rose.....	14	Back—back again to their holy fount.....	249	Oh, ask me not to waken.....	89	Yes, tis true, you are no poet.....	121
The man of the fly-market ferry.....	93	Come from my first, ay, come.....	43	Oh, no—it will not flourish 'neath my hand.....	137	Yes, I would add one humble leaf.....	161
The late Mr. Gilfert.....	96	Come hither, my fair child, and let me press.....	51	Oh, prize thou not too fond, too high.....	137	Yes, I have kept my tears for thee.....	393
The two gladiators.....	99	Choirs of the glad and free.....	177	Oh, know ye not that in the vale of time.....	161
The ghost.....	113	Child of my muse! in Barbour's gentle hand.....	185	One summer morn, when dewy flowers.....	169	MUSIC.....
Tom Sheridan.....	118	Come to me from the vistas of the past.....	233	Offspring of genius! welcome to our clime.....	186	The Harper's song.....	8
Turkish sports.....	139	Change—'tis pencil'd in words of light.....	273	One summer morn a damask fair.....	216	Ah! I remember that sweet hour.....	16
The artist and the countryman.....	139	Death on the warrior's brow.....	106	Once more—that strain once more.....	225	The merry mountain horn.....	24
The courier and the executioner.....	144	Dear Harry—you owe me a letter.....	352	Oh, heavenly Father! by that name.....	233	Oh swiftly glides the bonny boat.....	32
The experience of Howard.....	146	Earliest pledge of my affection.....	233	"On Susquehanna's side."—Roll on.....	241	Oh, we're a' noddin', mid, mid, noddin'.....	40
The messengers of Prince Charles.....	147	Excuse me, that the Mercury.....	361	Oh, would some kindly genius grant.....	285	Ah no, first love is but a name.....	48
The night songs of Venetian boatmen.....	147	Few are thy years, sweet Helena.....	9	Oh, bid me seek some trackless sea.....	273	Oh tell me how from love to fly.....	56
The proportion of males to females.....	153	Farewell, that hand's soft clasp.....	17	Our whole is a community of fame.....	297	Here we meet, too soon to part.....	64
The sensitive man.....	157	Farewell—loveliest scenes.....	251	O what is virtue? 'tis to keep.....	321	Pretty maiden, here am I.....	72
The drama as it is.....	160	Forget me not! above life's stream.....	321	O matrimony's fickle sea.....	342	Oh, sweetly, oh sweetly, the noon-day ending.....	80
The red man.....	161	Fanny, thou art young and gay.....	344	Oh, spare your hands, 'tis useless all this blarney.....	375	Oh, the horn of chase.....	88
The tooth-ache.....	166	Fair stranger, thou hast asked a boon.....	356	Oh thou lamented, absent one.....	401	She ne'er complained, nor told her wo.....	96
The life and times of Francis I. king of France.....	173	God of my sires! o'er ocean's brim.....	51	Pass on, relentless world.....	401	Not a drum was heard, nor a funeral note.....	104
Time for sleep.....	173	Granada, the beautiful.....	256	Remembered sorrow! darkly art thou sending.....	369	Honi soit qui mal y pense.....	120
The plot and history of Metamora.....	178	Glad season of reviving nature's charms.....	328	Smile on—that young lip well may smile.....	313	Courtier winks, money chinks.....	126
The drawing-room actress.....	185	How still the pensive twilight throws.....	29	She sat alone—and busy thought.....	303	Clanmen up! and march awa.....	152
The first quarrel.....	187	How happy the zephyr that kisses thy lip.....	41	She sat within that dismal tower.....	313	Hark! the muffled drum sounds the last march.....	168
The word of an Indian.....	195	Hail! little meteor of the gloom.....	43	She died in beauty—like a rose.....	368	Oh, father, since that fatal day.....	184
The advantages of a squire.....	196	He talked of daggers and of darts.....	81	Should the soul pass neglected.....	377	Hours there were to memory dearer.....	216
The barber and sailor.....	196	High on an eminence I stand.....	89	The young, the beautiful, the loved.....	1	Wilt thou meet me there, love.....	224
Things that are.....	205	How beautiful, thou lovely child.....	201	Though fair the pictured face.....	17	When sorrow spreads the venom'd dart.....	232
The magic rifle.....	206	He cometh in mercy! the promise of years.....	226	The moon is yet within her halls at rest.....	25	O well do I remember.....	240
The village romance.....	209	Harsh of the winds of heaven.....	227	The gale had sweetness as it wandered by.....	33	My heart's in the Highlands.....	248
The banker and the king.....	214	Haste with the song thou hast murmured in.....	241	They tell me, gentle lady.....	33	The Greek exile's farewell to Naxos.....	256
The confession.....	220	childhood.....	241	Thou hast been reared too tenderly.....	42	Upon the hill he turned.....	264
Titles in America.....	221	High sounds of festal glee.....	249	The sky with silvery drapery of clouds.....	43	Oh now the dark-eyed even.....	272
The sceptic. An old man's story.....	226	Hoboken, with thy poplar shore.....	257	They say that hope is happiness.....	81	The Tyrolean song of freedom.....	280
The bachelor's bridal.....	233	How have I thought of thee.....	283	The birds, when winter shades the sky.....	87	Boot and saddle, bonny Scot.....	288
The steam engine.....	238	He was a son of genius—mind.....	289	To thee—when morn is shining.....	112	Come away then, away then, my merry Swiss.....	296
Turkish beauties.....	239	Here will I pause—to view the hallowed spot.....	361	Time is a traitor, full of wiles.....	118	The Tyrolean peasant's song.....	304
The reformation.....	249	How pleased, when flowers their dewy petals.....	361	There is no parting tear.....	121	Gentle Zitella, whither away.....	312
The infidel.....	254	close.....	363	They come—on spirit wings they come.....	129	Blow, blow thou wintry wind.....	320
The founding of Nuremberg.....	254	How calm and glorious is the hour of night.....	401	The nightingale's soft voice I hear.....	129	Love is like a little bee.....	325
The false rhyme.....	256	I know not why that on my heart.....	9	Thou in the cold still grave, and I.....	137	The Swabian beggar's song.....	336
The duel.....	262	I fondly marked within a gay parterre.....	33	Those autumn tresses sweetly play.....	153	Sleep on thy pillow, happy and light.....	344
The tomb of a victim of criticism.....	272	It is the hour of vespers now.....	33	The Mirror—oh the Mirror.....	179	The moon is on the hill.....	362
The Arabian steed.....	278			To wish thee bliss in courteous phrase.....	179	The strawberry girl.....	360
The gaud.....	287			Thou art gone to the south, where the light.....	183	The Highland minstrel boy.....	368
The candour family.....	289			breeze.....	183	The merry mountain boy.....	376
The parturient.....	307			The morn was breaking—night had pass'd away.....	193	Oh murmur not, love.....	384
The shipwreck.....	321			Thou com'st in gloom and sorrow back.....	193	The days of old romance.....	392
The closing of life.....	323			The longer life, the more offence.....	195	When forced from dear Hebe to go.....	400
The two gas-lamps.....	334			Time is a dotard, I'll wager a half-penny.....	210	Morning beams are twinkling, listen, Abra dear.....	408
The schoolmaster.....	341
The picture.....	341

END OF VOLUME SEVENTH.

[illegible]

